The department is not at all discouraged because every newspaper in the country has not found it possible to cooperate with it in its work. The efforts of the department have stimulated many papers to solicit church advertising more vigorously than before, and best of all, to study the problem of the use of display space to encourage readers to attend some church service each Sunday. Those papers which have gone into the matter most thoroughly have found that they thus are building a stable foundation for additional prestige in the community which they could lay in no other way.

It is entirely probable that at the end of ten or fifteen years the newspapers and churches will express their gratitude that this pioneer work of relating newspapers to the churches has been in the hands of sane and constructive individuals among the enthusiasts of church advertising. There are many types of church advertising, as there are of commercial advertising. It has been the effort of the Church Advertising Department to encourage the constructive educational type of copy rather than the flamboyant emotional type which, however, some pastors are able to use with considerable success. The department has built its copy suggestions in the hope that the material would have the effect of building a well-knit congregation in individual churches rather than a mere audience on special occasions. The church is not a Chautauqua nor a vaudeville stage. It is very largely an educational institution, and the copy that represents it truly ought to be educational in character.

The advertising conference held in Milwaukee last June in connection with the A. A. C. of W. convention was a marked success.

The Church Advertising Department contributed of its personnel to the program of the national advertising conference conducted by the Church Federation of Chicago last October.

Efforts are being continued to obtain a modest regular support for the Department in order that it may cooperate with local advertising clubs in the conduct of classes in church advertising. The President of the Department, Rev. Christian F. Reisner, D.D., has been tireless in his efforts to further the cause of church advertising. None of the officers of the Department receives salary. In the parlance of the streets, they are all "nuts," giving freely of their time and energy to the end that both churches and advertising managers may see the advantages of mutual cooperation. They believe thoroughly that the best good of the nation and the world can be brought about if every person goes to church and practices in his public and private life the principles of Christianity. The governing board is made up of men of all denominations and the copy issued has met the approval of both Protestant and Catholic. Proofs of Series No. 3—fifty-two pieces—may be obtained by any newspaper publisher on request to Herbert H. Smith, 518 Witherspoon Bldg., Philadelphia.

HOW CAN YOUR PAPER BEST HELP THE CHURCHES?

The churches in your town want to reach with their influence every reader of your paper. Many pastors don't know how. Most of them are eager to learn. You have in your organization men who can assist or who can obtain from local copy writers skilled assistance for the churches in preparing copy which will help fill the vacant pews in your town. Why not undertake this community service in 1923? Suggest to the local advertising club that it cooperate with the churches.

Study the whole relation of the churches and Christianity to printer's ink, and offer your assistance to the churches. Don't worry about present financial returns. They will come later, if not at once.

TRADE FLEXIDEAL DRY MATS MAXITYPE MARKS

SQUARE DEAL

The name FLEXIDEAL has become synonymous to many newspapers throughout the country with SQUARE DEALING. With us that much abused word SERVICE takes on its good old-fashioned meaning of honestly-priced merchandise of superior quality, strict adherence to shipping details and no sparing of expense to properly take care of and satisfy the needs of our customers.

FLEXIDEAL and MAXITYPE DRY MATS are the best dry mats to be had regardless of price, and yet they afford a worth-while saving. They are made by the oldest and largest factories of their kind in the world. In fact the dry mat originated there.

FLEXIDEAL and MAXITYPE DRY MATS are the only dry mats which have passed the experimental stage (they are in use throughout the world) and are being improved and perfected all the time.

FLEXIDEAL and MAXITYPE DRY MATS
—make the paste pot an unnecessary nuisance —eliminate the steam tables
—save valuable time
—save newsprint paper
—mean dollars and cents to the management and better work and working conditions to the stereotyper.

FLEXIDEAL AND MAXITYPE DRY MATS CAN MEAN JUST AS MUCH TO YOU!

YOU WILL EVENTUALLY STEREOTYPE THE DRY MAT WAY SO YOU MIGHT AS WELL GET THE BEST YOUR MONEY CAN BUY!

Our large stock at the Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, assures you a constant supply and prompt shipments. No need of stocking up—you can have your mats as you need them and when you want them.

Net Paid 23,911 Circulation

With fully Five Times the combined circulation of all other Rhode Island Evening Newspapers in its territory, it is admittedly a distinct proposition in point of advertising value. The Times goes into practically every home in three cities: Pawtucket, Central Falls and Attleboro, Mass. No combination of all other daily newspapers sold in the territory can give even 50% coverage.

FURTHER PROOF

The necessity of using The Pawtucket Times to fully cover this Trading Territory of 140,000 is proven by the fact that the Principal

For the Year 1922 THE SYRACUSE HERALD was

FIRST in TOTAL Advertising in Syracuse.
First in LOCAL Advertising in Syracuse.
First in NATIONAL Advertising in Syracuse.
First in AUTOMOTIVE Advertising in Syracuse.
First in IMPORTANT classifications in Syracuse.

Concentration of circulation in the city and suburban territory of Syracuse, with a minimum waste of out of the territory circulation, confining itself to assisting in solving Syracuse selling problems, plus the highest buying power, the result of a better newspaper make for this record.

The Sunday Herald has a city circulation more than 100% greater than the other Syracuse Sunday paper and a total circulation 30,000 greater than the other Syracuse Sunday newspaper.

The Evening Herald has a greater circulation, in Syracuse and in the Syracuse A. B. C. Trading Zone than any other newspaper except The Sunday Herald.

The Herald service department offers real cooperation to advertisers, assisting them to link the created demand from advertising space with a distribution at a time when it is most profitable.

Following are the lineage figures for the three Syracuse newspapers for 1922.

"—the greatest daily paper of Canada and always has been!"

—HAROLD B. JOHNSON

SPEAKING at St. Lawrence University recently on the subject of "Personalities of American Newspapers," Harold B. Johnson, editor of the Watertown (N. Y.) Times, paid the following tribute to "Canada's Best Newspaper":—

> "Here is the Montreal Gazette. It is the greatest daily paper of Canada and always has been. It is British, yet it is American. It has been run continuously since 1778, and Benjamin Franklin was indirectly responsible for its appearance. Franklin and a group of colonists went to Montreal in '76, carrying with them a printing outfit from Philadelphia, their purpose being to win over Canadians to the Continental cause. They published several volumes in the old Chateau de Ramsey and when they gave up their mission to return to Philadelphia one of the printers remained and three years later he established this great newspaper with the printing outfit that came from Philadelphia.
> "The Gazette had its beginning in the same way that so many of the older papers were established, in a propaganda movement in behalf of some cause. To-day it impresses itself on the entire British possessions as a herald of empire solidarity."

This disinterested tribute, from a journalist of another country, is an unusual piece of evidence of the regard in which The Gazette is held —in Canada or elsewhere—wherever it is known.

The Gazette is the only five cent daily newspaper in Montreal and it is likewise the only English morning paper in Montreal. Established in 1778 it is also Canada's oldest newspaper.

Is Canada's "greatest daily newspaper" on your list?

BALTIMORE MARYLAND

CANADIAN LEGISLATION IN 1922

Sales Tax on Engravings, Electrotypes, etc.—As some confusion existed as to the rate of sale tax applicable in the case of sales of engravings, electrotypes, etc., by the manufacturers thereof to publishers of newspapers, magazines and trade papers, as well as to job printers, the excise authorities at Ottawa in April issued a ruling, which made the 3 per cent rate effective in these cases. Ordinarily sales by manufacturers of goods to wholesalers are subject to a tax of 1½ per cent, and to retailers or consumers of 3 per cent, and by wholesalers to retailers or consumers of 1½ per cent. The point was as to whether the printer was to be regarded as a wholesaler or a consumer and the decision is to the effect that, for the purposes of the tax, he is a consumer. If he re-sells an electro or engraving to an advertiser, the sale is not subject to any tax, as the sale tax does not apply to sale by retailers or consumers.

Blue Law Enforcement in Canada, Too.—Victoria (B. C.) voters gave a seven-to-one majority against enforcement here of the Lord's Day Act, which had been ordered by the police commission. The order prohibited the operation of newsstands on Sundays. The result of the plebiscite vote taken showed that Victoria was emphatic in its demand for newspapers on Sunday. Efforts are now being made to have the Lord's Day Act, which is a Federal statute, repealed or severely amended.

Imported Printed Matter Must State Country of Origin.—Publishers of newspapers, magazines, and books, printers and advertisers, were affected by new Canadian Customs regulations, put into force on November 1, so that they can no longer ship in or mail into Canada any printed matter for use by their dealers, for distribution over the counter or to be sent through the mails, unless it bears the imprint "Made in the United States" or other country of origin. The new regulations apply to newspapers as well as all other publications and printed matter generally. According to an interpretation given by the Department of Customs to Editor & Publisher, of the clauses defining ways in which origin can be indicated, the usual publisher's statement in newspapers will be regarded as sufficient, provided the address given includes state and country.

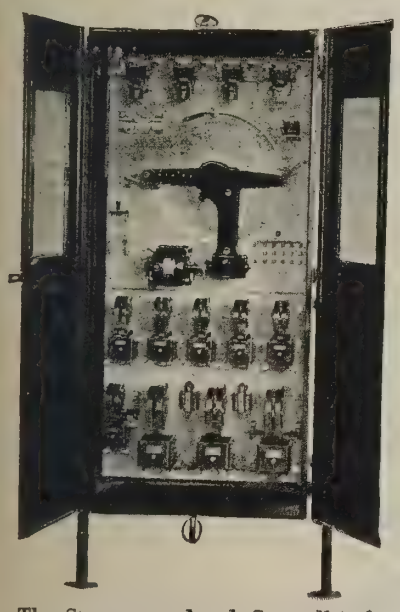
Sprague Electric Motor Drive and Control Systems for Newspaper Presses

Conceded First Place in the Press equipment field for Superior Construction and Unequalled performance.



Over 400 installations in this country and abroad bear testimony to the Reliability and Safety of the Sprague System

The largest contract for Controls and Drives for one plant was placed this year by the Philadelphia Public Ledger for Sprague Equipments, after a careful examination of all other systems.

So many publishers are recognizing the freedom from worry which comes from doing business with Sprague Electric, that this year has been one of the largest in their history in this specialized field.

NEWSPRINT STATISTICS FOR 1922

Records of the News Print Service Bureau show the production of newsprint paper in North America hung up a new record in 1922, the total for the United States and Canada surpassing by some 140,000 tons the previous high mark of nearly 2,400,000 tons in 1920. Of this total the United States produced 1,448,000 tons, or 223,000 tons more than in 1921, when the output was reduced by prolonged strikes and also more than any previous year except 1920 when the total was 1,512,000 tons. In 1920, however, the product of the regular newsprint mills in the United States was supplemented by perhaps 80,000 tons from the so-called marginal mills, which did not contribute so heavily to the newsprint supply in 1922.

The development of newsprint manufacture in Canada is shown by the fact that the output last year was 1,082,000 tons or over 200,000 tons more than the 1920 record of 876,000 tons and 34 per cent more than in 1921.

In addition to these totals for the United States and Canada, 60,000 tons of newsprint was produced in Newfoundland and probably about 10,000 tons in the one mill in Mexico which makes newsprint, thus giving a production of 2,600,000 tons for the North American continent.

Shipments from the mills during 1922 more than kept pace with the increased output, and while mill stocks are never large, the total at the end of the year was 11,000 tons less than at the beginning and equivalent to only about three days' production.

The compilation of import figures has been so greatly delayed since the new tariff law went into effect on September 22 that it will be some time before the total imports of newsprint from Europe into the United States during 1922 will be known. Apparently, however, the final figure will not exceed 100,000 tons, a decrease of 26 per cent from the 135,000 tons brought in from overseas during 1921. The heaviest importation of European newsprint was from August, 1921, to February, 1922, when the average was 14,500 tons per month. Since that date the monthly average has been materially less and it does not appear likely that the previous maximum will again be reached.

As the production figures suggest, the consumption of newsprint paper in the United States reached a new high record in 1922. In round numbers it was 16 per cent more than in 1921 and 12 per cent more than during the previous record-breaking year of 1920. Publishers who report their monthly tonnage to the Federal Trade Commission and who use a large proportion of the total output exceeded their 1920 consumption by 14 per cent, the 1919 consumption by 22 per cent and the 1918 consumption by 55 per cent. Publishers stocks of white paper at the end of 1922 were equivalent to 36 days' supply at the current rate of consumption.

Adding imports to domestic production and deducting exports there was not less than 44 lbs. per capita of newsprint paper available for consumption in the United States in 1922 compared with 15 lbs. in 1900.

There are between 60 and 70 newspaper[illegible] the United States, having circulations in e[illegible] of 100,000 copies. During 1920 and 1921 [illegible] dailies averaged 23 pages each, and during [illegible] they rose to 25 pages. For the same years [illegible] Sunday issues of these papers averaged 7[illegible] and 89 pages respectively.

There are more than 22,000 newspapers in [illegible] United States and Canada of which some 1[illegible] are monthlies and country weeklies, while [illegible] circulation of the English language dailie[illegible] approximately 30,000,000 for the week-day i[illegible] and 20,000,000 for the Sunday issues of [illegible] newspapers.

Paper making in North America is a bi[illegible] dollar industry, with the production of n[illegible] print making up a large proportion of the [illegible] investment and further notable developments [illegible] under way.

The new machines to come into news[illegible] production during the six or eight months [illegible] 1923 will have a capacity of 600 tons of p[illegible] daily, carrying the total capacity of the indu[illegible] beyond 9,000 tons daily, of which some [illegible] tons is in the United States and more than 4[illegible] tons in Canada. Still further extensions are [illegible] der consideration.

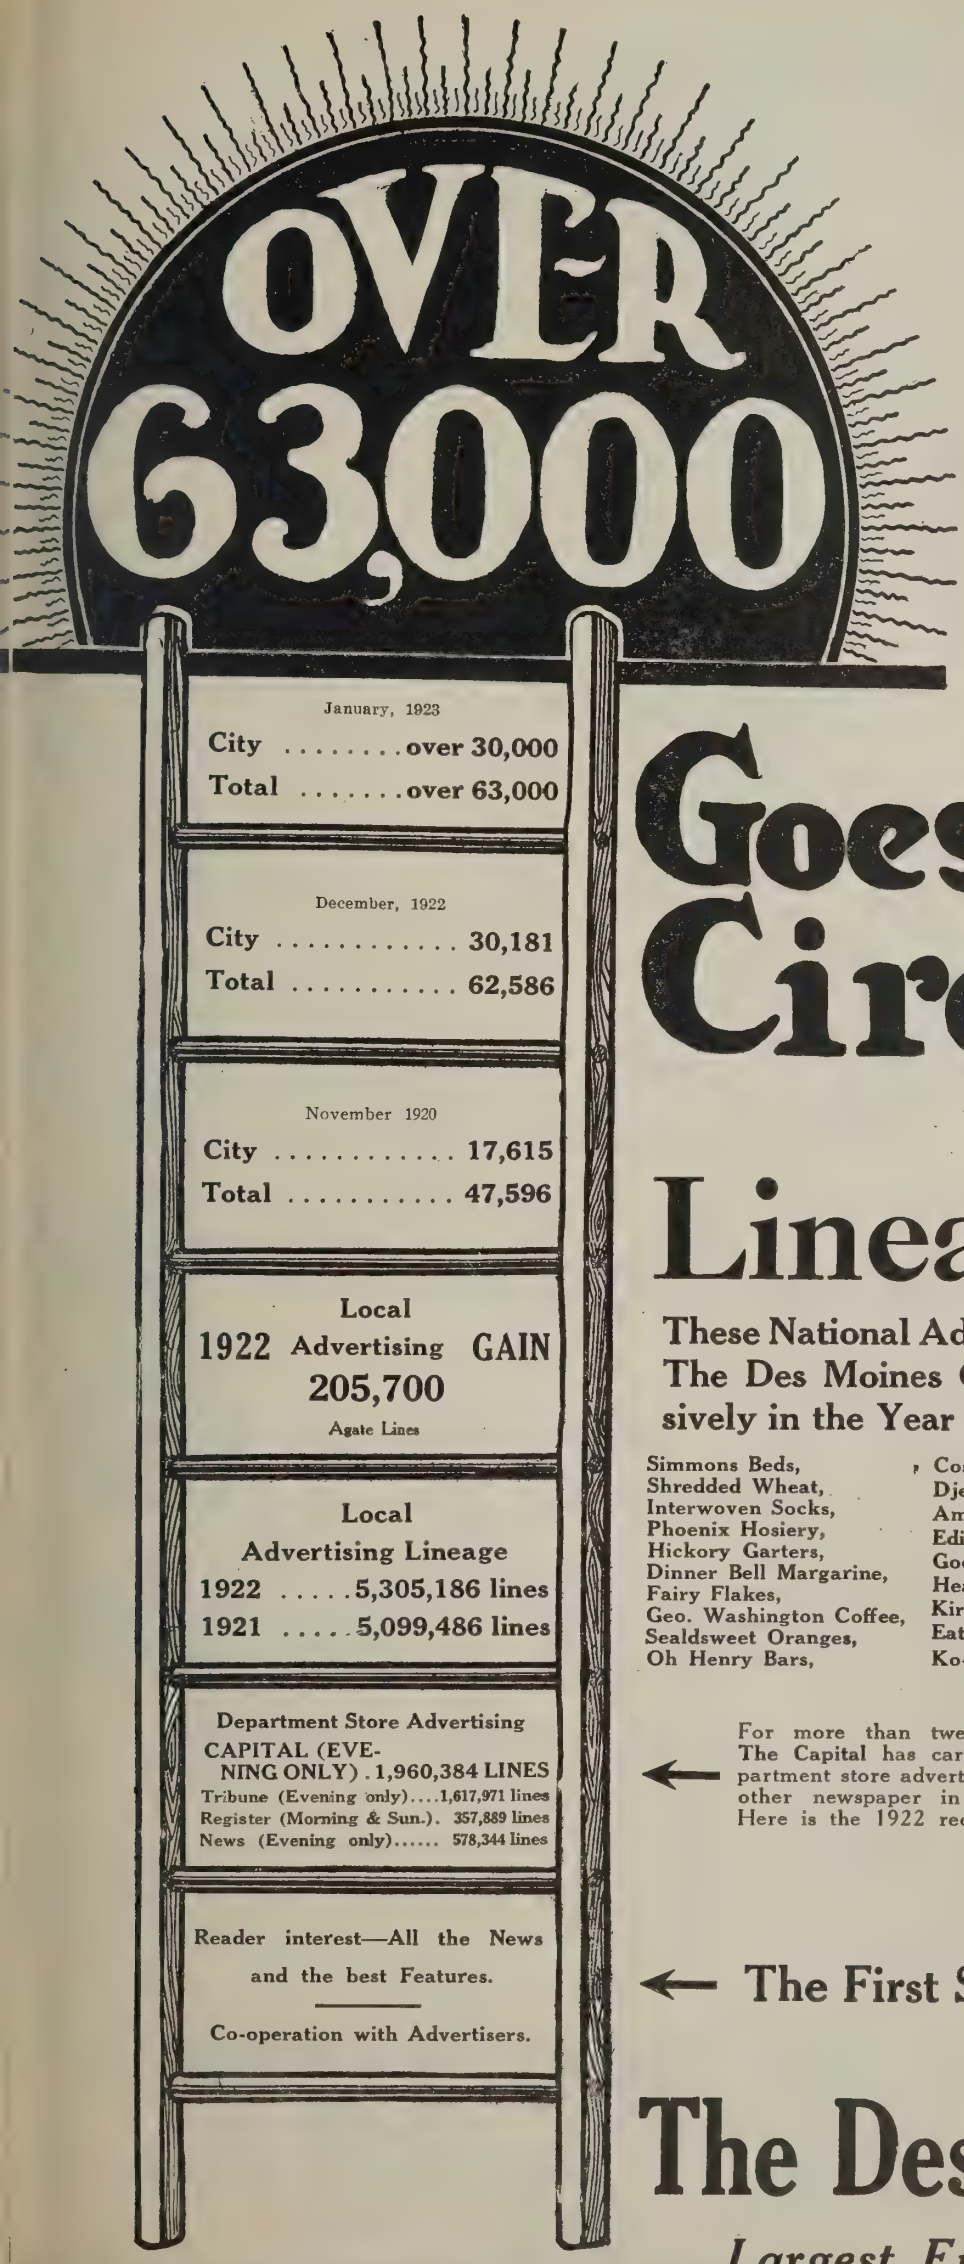
THE MIAMI OKLAHOMA DISTRICT DAILY NEWS

carries more advertising than any other paper in Ottawa County. From June 1st to September 12th the News carried 246,489 more lines of advertising than the next highest newspaper.

This is an acknowledgment of its power that the advertiser should heed when outlining his next advertising campaign, as Miami and Ottawa County is a field that should be thoroughly covered by advertisers, from the fact that it is the leading agricultural county of the state, and the center of the greatest zinc and lead mining district in the world, populated by about 45,000 people, most of whom are readers of the News. Adjacent to Miami are also ten towns with a population of from 500 to 10,000 who depend on the News for their advertising and news. Most of these towns are connected with Miami by an interurban system centering here.

It will be to your advantage to include the News in your 1923 advertising campaign.

Our service department is ready at all times to furnish any information you may desire.



The value of the ore sold for week ending December 23rd was $1,169,380. Worth consideration.

London, England—The Times passed again into the control of the Walter family on the death of Lord Northcliffe, in consideration of what is understood to have been a payment of £1,390,000 by John Walter, a direct descendant of the man who founded the paper in 1775. John Jacob Astor is associated with Mr. Walter in acquiring the Northcliffe and Sir John Ellerman holdings.

London—Operation of London Daily Mail and other Northcliffe publications was assumed, after the death of Lord Northcliffe, by his brother, Lord Rothermere. The Times was excluded from the arrangement, being sold shortly afterwards to John Walter and John Jacob Astor.

London—Lord Dalziel retired from English journalism after 30 years' active work, selling his stock in London Daily Chronicle, Pall Mall Gazette, and associated publications to Sir John Leigh. C. A. McCurdy succeeded Lord Dalziel as head of publications.

Reader Interest in Better Homes is demonstrated not only by the rapidly growing number of daily newspapers which are using our regular but by the large attendance upon the Better Homes Expositions and Institutes conducted under our auspices.

Are You Responding to This Public Demand?

Better Homes Service is now issued in both daily and weekly forms. Proofs and prices will be sent on application.

This service is written by experts; the illustrations are unique. They are made from photographs prepared exclusively for us, selected and grouped by expert interior decorators, without any reference to the origin of the articles shown, but solely from the point of view of their beauty and appropriateness. No manufacturer or dealer, nor any group of manufacturers or dealers, has a word to say as to what shall be shown in these pictures. In the selection of subjects the effort is made to show articles that can be purchased anywhere, articles that are within the means of the average reader.

Our cuts are now being made by a new process which insures the best printing results it is possible to obtain from a halftone mat. They are 55-line screen, deep etched (five "bites") on copper and with the high lights tooled out.

This Service Also Pleases Advertisers

Many papers are finding its use of great value in building up their furniture, house furnishing and similar classifications. A list of newspapers to which we have sold one or another of our Better Homes Services since September 1, 1922, is printed on this page.

When Shall We Start Service to You?

A World Pioneer

From America, the A. B. C. has blazed the Path of Verified Circulations around the World.

In Great Britain and Holland Audit Bureaus have been organized and are now furnishing Circulation Data to Advertisers and Agencies. They are as yet in their infancy but will surely grow.

Movements looking to the establishment of similar bureaus have been started in France, Japan and Australia.

The A. B. C. has received urgent appeals to extend its organization to cover Panama, Honolulu, Manila and Cuba.

Like all reforms that are based on a sound, economic need, Verified Circulation has established itself as a fundamental necessity for the progress of the Advertising and Publishing profession.

The growth and development of the A. B. C. is safely assured through the enthusiastic co-operation that has been given in its Eight Years of existence by the progressive publishers and advertising men of the United States and Canada.

HOTALING'S News Stand

IN NEW YORK

At the North End of the Times Bldg.
Broadway and Forty-Third Street

When the folks from your town come down to our town, tell them that they can get your newspaper at our stand.

They probably prefer your newspaper to any other newspaper published on earth and we help you keep the home fires burning while the boys and girls of your town are here in our town.

We sell more out-of-town newspapers than does any other news stand in America.

"Perhaps the most cosmopolitan spot in New York City is Forty Third street and Broadway. . . Here is a mammoth news stand which sells newspapers from every city in the world. . . Every town has similar stands, but none as huge as this, and none as varied and as picturesque in its patronage."

—Boston Transcript, Oct. 29, 1921.

65c a day invested in The Multi-Mailer System will enable publishers with small mail lists to give their subscribers a mail delivery service unsurpassed.

Would it be worth 65c a day to you and your publication to be able to —give your mail subscribers a better mail delivery service —reduce subscriber complaints to almost nothing

—provide for daily correction of your mail list

—lift your mail list out of your Composing Room and Galley Room, and put it under the sole control of the Circulation Department —print addresses direct on your publications?

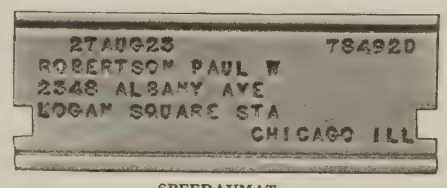
It may not cost you 65c

When we set the installation and upkeep cost of The Multi-Mailer System at 65c a day, we give you the outside figure.

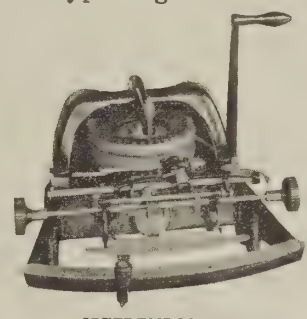
Many publishers find that this 65c is more than offset by the money saved through eliminating the time of a linotype operator and a Galley Room employee.

The fact that The Multi-Mailer System usually pays for itself is of minor importance compared to the way in which it builds subscriber satisfaction by giving subscribers the mail delivery service they expected when they subscribed.



Send for catalogue

Let us send you descriptive literature about The Multi-Mailer System with which any publication can handle every listing, addressing, and mailing operation connected with your mail list with greater ease, speed, efficiency—and, possibly, economy.



Write for catalogue today.

THE SPEEDAUMATIC COMPANY
817-825 Washington Blvd. :-: Chicago

HERE'S an adaptation of The Multi-Mailer System ideally suited for mail lists with as few as 1,000 names. The operations are simple. Speedaumats are embossed on a Speedembosser with subscriber's name, address, expiration date, and serial number. Speedaumats correspond to linotype slugs.

SPEEDAUMAT

SPEEDEMBOSSER

THEY are embossed and altered by a Circulation Department employee on a Speedembosser which is kept in the Circulation Department. Card proofs for the Expiration File are made on a Speedaustamp of all Speedaumats made or changed. The Speedaumats are then filed in a cabinet kept in the Circulation Department, so that the mail list is always accessible for additions and changes.

AT mailing time, the Speedaumats are fed into a Speedaudresser by which publications can be addressed direct at the rate of 2,000 to 3,500 an hour, depending on the skill of the operator. This machine has an attachment for printing strip or office check sheets.

SPEEDAUDRESSER

These mechanical elements, when woven together by the UNIT PLAN OF OPERATION, provide a method of handling the mail list which prevents preventable errors, does away with duplicated labor, and makes subscriber complaints regarding delays and non-deliveries few and far between. A complete explanation of the UNIT PLAN will be sent with a copy of the catalogue.

The Speedaumatic TRADE MARK Company.

Mad as a March Hare!

Is the pressman whose Rollers melt in the press just when a rush job is about three-quarters completed. This trouble is very serious on flatbed presses, but even more so on newspaper presses where editions have to be out on schedule time. To avoid the delay and loss caused through soft or melted Rollers, equip your presses with our which is guaranteed not to melt under three hundred and fifty degrees of heat. The same Roller can be used on hot, humid, or dry, cold days, eliminating the changing from hard to soft Rollers. Duplex Rollers have more tack and resiliency than the regular composition Roller, and give clear, sharp effects on all printing, regardless of the kind it may be.

Rollers are shipped to and from our nearest factory.

Prices will be quoted on request. Address all correspondence to the New York office.

For the best volume of verse published during the year by an American author, $1,000.

These traveling scholarships, having a value of $1,500 each, will be awarded:

On the nomination of the teaching staff of the School of Journalism three traveling scholarships to graduates of the School of Journalism, who shall have passed their examinations with the highest honor and are otherwise the most deserving, to enable each of them to spend a year in Europe, to study the social, political and moral conditions of the people and the character and principles of the European press.

Competition for these scholarships is not necessarily restricted to those who are graduated from the School of Journalism in the year when the award is made.

An annual scholarship to the student of music in America who may be deemed the most talented and deserving, in order that he may continue his studies with the advantage of European instruction, on the nomination of a jury composed of members of the teaching staff of the Department of Music in Columbia University and of the teaching staff of the Institute of Musical Art.

An annual scholarship to an art student in America, who shall be certified as the most promising and deserving by the National Academy of Design, with which the Society of American Artists has been merged.

The awards will be made by the trustees of Columbia University on the recommendation of the advisory board of the School of Journalism. Nominations of candidates, it is provided, must be made in writing addressed to the Secretary of Columbia University on forms that may be obtained by application to him.

LEGISLATION IN 1922

UNITED STATES

Pan-Pacific Radio News Communications, Via U. S. Navy Stations, Extended.—Use of the navy's radio facilities for press and commercial purposes for a period of another three years was authorized April 14, when President Harding signed the Congressional joint resolution authorizing the extension, for which the newspapers of the country had been fighting for nearly a year. By the provisions of the resolution private messages will be transmitted by Naval radio from June 5, 1922, when the present permission expires, to June 30, 1925. The full period of the extension, however, does not apply to China. The service to Chinese stations will be terminated on January 1, 1924, because of international wireless agreement for China made at the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments and Far Eastern Questions. The three-year extension amounted to a compromise of the views of the House and Senate conferees on the resolution, and was considered by the newspapers as the best arrangement which could be made in the face of strong Congressional opposition to any form of extension. The sentiment of several members of the House against continuance of what they regarded as "government in business," was overcome only with the greatest difficulty through intervention by President Harding, who heartily concurred with the newspaper view that use of the navy radio was essential if adequate and reasonably-priced communication was to be had with Hawaii, the Philippines and other outlying sections of the Far East.

No Relief from High Second-Class Postage Rates.—Efforts to obtain relief through Congress from war-time second-class postal rates, through the passage of the Kelly Bill, providing for reductions to the basis of 1919-20 until the Congressional Joint Committee investigating post office operating costs would report its findings, failed December 12, when House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads again postponed consideration of the measure. Although all publishing interests were united in their advocacy of the Kelly Bill, the committee's vote was 10 to 5 upon a motion to again delay action on the bill until the Joint Postal Commission should report. Six members of the committee failed in their pledges to take favorable action on the measure, made when a report on the bill was postponed in June on the understanding that the Joint Postal Commission would report on mail costs by December 1. The report has not been made and no date has been designated for its final submission.

Blue Law Enforcement.—On the morning of July 1, a committee, appointed by a mass meeting of 235 men and women of the Christian Protestant Laymen's Federation of Vicksbu Miss., and Warren County, presented a petit to the mayor to suppress Sunday baseball, S day moving pictures, opening of pool and liard rooms on the Sabbath, bootlegging gambling. That evening the mayor, J. Hayes, issued instructions to the police to force all the Blue Laws to the letter. E. Fitzgerald, Sr., business manager and, up Saturday afternoon, part owner of the Her was notified that if the men worked after urday midnight, every one would be arrest The men worked until 11.30 Saturday nig left the building, and returned at 12.01 M day morning, completed the work and the per, Sunday's edition, went to press Mon morning. Thus, it took two days to get one edition of the Sunday Herald. It was first Blue Law Sunday in Vicksburg, and few people were satisfied, as some got m than they wanted, and others were vexed annoyed because the thing went too far. Sunday moving pictures began operation in days of the open saloon and the church pe requested that they open as a counter attraction to the saloons.

It cost J. B. Rees, reporter for the Dayton (Ohio) Daily News, $33.70 to have violated the Sunday Blue Laws in Piqua, Ohio. Rees was sent to Piqua August 13 by the Dayton News to get a story on the operations of the Blue Laws on the first day of their observance under the proclamation issued by the mayor. He was arrested, pleaded guilty, and was fined $25, and costs, amounting to a total of $33.70, which he paid. Mayor DeWeese issued his proclamation calling for strict enforcement of the Blue Laws after the ministerial association of the city had taken steps to close the theatres on Sunday by arresting the proprietors under the state law. The mayor was not in sympathy with the move, but believes in "fighting fire with fire." The Blue Law proclamation was the result. The newspapers co-operated with the mayor and not an outside Sunday newspaper went into the city. To get a paper, it was necessary to go to Troy eight miles away.

Congress Fails to Bar "Gambling" News from Newspapers.—Attempt to pass Congressional legislation preventing newspapers from printing racing odds and other information which might promote gambling, in the form of the Walsh rider to the Sterling-Sims Bill, was not successful. The law would have barred all publications carrying such matter from the mails.

"Newspaper" Expenses Must Be Accounted For by Those Seeking Congressional Seats.—Senator Walter E. Edge's amendment providing for newspaper exemption from the campaign expense limitations provided in the Pomerene bill, failed to be adopted when the bill was passed by the U. S. Senate, September 2. The amendment undertook to strike out the words "other than in newspapers" from that part of the measure which excepted certain items, including printing, other than in newspapers, from the amount permitted in the legitimate expenses, $5,000 for election to the House and $10,000 for election to the Senate.

A bill was introduced, early in 1923, in the Minnesota Senate, making it a misdemeanor for any person to furnish false information to any editor or reporter or any other person for publication. It had not been finally acted upon at the time THE INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK went to press.

Would Allow Lien Action Against Newspapers in Libel Suits.—The Massachusetts Legislature Joint Judiciary Committee in March considered a bill providing drastic lien action against newspapers sued for libel which fail to furnish bonds to the amount of the damage claimed. It was introduced by Edward J. Gallagher of Boston. The bill read:

> Section 1—When the tangible property held by the publisher or publishers of any newspaper or periodical is insufficient to meet the amount of a damage claim made in suit for libel brought against said newspaper or periodical, and when the defendant or defendants fail to furnish a bond for the amount of said claim within three days after notice of suit, the plaintiff shall be given a lien on the newspaper or periodical and on any property of said publisher or publishers to satisfy any judgment that may be obtained by the plaintiff on trial of said suit.
> "If the editor-in-chief of said newspaper or periodical and the owner or owners of the printing plant from which it is issued are not also the publisher or publishers thereof, they may also be made defendants in any suit for libel brought upon the provisions and scope of this act.
> "Should the sums accruing from the lien as aforesaid be sufficient to meet the amount of the judgment, and should no settlement be made in any other way, then said newspaper or periodical shall be denied the right of publication, pending full settlement of the judgment, and during the interim it shall not be reissued under the same or any other parties."
> Section 2—The act shall take effect upon its passage.

It was not passed.

Plan to Punish Newsdealer Profiteers Fails.—Assemblyman Yacenda of Brooklyn introduced a bill in the New York Assembly in February to prevent profiteering in newspapers, and making it a misdemeanor for any person, firm or corporation as news dealer, agent or newsboy to sell any newspaper at a price greater than the purchase price per copy as printed on the face of the paper. The penalty provided was a fine of $25, or thirty days in jail, or both. It was not passed.

New Basis of Payment for Legal Ads.—Senator Caleb H. Baumes of Newburgh, N. Y., introduced a bill in the New York State Legislature which reduces the present rate charged for publication of session laws, summons and legal orders and notices by basing the rates to be paid on the circulation of the newspaper in which they are printed. The bill was in the hands of the judiciary committee when THE INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK went to press.

Virginia Punishes News Fakers.—The Virginia General Assembly passed a law making it a misdemeanor for any person to give false news to a newspaper, magazine or other publication. A law was also passed prohibiting any one from printing any design, figure, emblem or advertisement and the like upon a newspaper which may cause the public to believe that it was the work of the publisher of the paper. These two laws are as follows:

> Be it enacted, that any person who knowingly and wilfully states, delivers or transmits by any means whatever to any publisher, or employe of a publisher, of any newspaper, magazine, or other publication, any false and untrue statement concerning any person or corporation, with intent that the same shall be published, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.
> It shall be unlawful for any person, without first obtaining the consent of the publisher so to do, to print, stamp or impress upon any newspaper or any part thereof, after the same shall have been issued for circulation by the publisher thereof, any word, figure, design, picture, emblem or advertisement with intent to cause, or which when so printed, stamped or impressed may cause, the public to believe that such word, figure, design, picture, emblem or advertisement was printed, stamped or impressed in and upon such newspaper by the publisher of the same as a part thereof.

Town Law Makers Bar Reporters.—The board of borough burgesses of Torrington, Conn., voted to bar all newspaper representatives from its meetings. The former board took similar action and was not re-elected.

EFFECTING ADVERTISING

St. Louis Bans Fake Bargain Sale Advertising.—A new ordinance with respect to advertising now in effect in St. Louis made it unlawful for dealers to use private residences as a blind in offering merchandise. The practice among certain dealers in St. Louis in the sale of pianos, phonographs, and automobiles especially had been to advertise by giving the address of a residence and declaring that the article is on a forced sale. Many people imagined that such sales provided bargains. The ordinance follows:

ORDINANCE 32093.

> "Be it ordained by the City of St. Louis, as follows:
> "Section One. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, partnership, corporation, association, trust, or any employe thereof, engaged in the business of selling goods, wares, merchandise, securities, service or real estate to advertise the sale of the same unless it shall be stated in the advertisement of such sale, clearly and unequivocally, that said person advertising such sale of goods, wares, merchandise, securities, or real estate is a dealer in the same; provided, however, that the advertisement of the sale of any goods, wares, merchandise, securities, service or real estate in such form as to make it plainly apparent therefrom that the person so advertising is actually engaged in the business of selling such goods, wares, merchandise, securities, service or real estate as a business, shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the terms of this ordinance. Any person violating the provision of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than twenty dollars nor more than five hundred dollars for each offense.
> "Approved December 4, 1922."

Missouri Enforces Billboard Laws.—Missouri State Highway Commission decided to enforce the provisions of the new State highway law prohibiting the posting of advertising matter on the right-of-way of state highways. Highway and trail associations and automobile clubs were authorized to remove advertising displayed on trees, fence posts and bill boards, and put up instead finger boards showing directions and distances to various cities.

New York State Session Law Advertising Completely Abolished.—Governor Miller of New York signed the bill of Assemblyman Charles H. Betts abolishing the publication of the session laws in the official state paper, the Albany Evening Journal. In 1921 a law was passed doing away with the publication of the laws and concurrent resolutions of the legislature in newspapers throughout the state, except the state paper. The existing law still provides for the publication in the state paper: "All appointment of terms of the Supreme Court; the rules of practice adopted from time to time by the judges of the Court of Appeals and a convention constituted pursuant to the judiciary law and notices and advertisements required to be published in a newspaper by state officers, or by a department, board, bureau or commission of the state, or in actions against foreign corporations. The publication of such notices and advertisements shall be additional to their publication in other newspapers."

Utah's Anti-Cigarette Advertising Law.—The Utah anti-cigarette law is hurting advertising receipts within the state to the extent of $150,000 a year, according to A. L. Fish, general manager of the Salt Lake City Telegram. The law has 3 sections. One prohibits the sale of cigarettes, another forbids their use in certain public places, and the third makes it illegal to advertise them. This last section has been obeyed to the letter and is the only one which has been observed. Mr. Fish is leading an effort to have the next session of the legislature repeal the law.

False Advertising Law in Wilmington, Del.—The City Council of Wilmington, Del., at the instance of the Chamber of Commerce and with support of the newspapers, in March passed an ordinance forbidding questionable advertising. The law provides a $10 fine for violations.

No More Faking in Walla Walla.—Thirty days in jail or a $100 fine, or a combination of both, is the maximum penalty provided by the new pure advertising ordinance passed by the city commissioners of Walla Walla, Wash., in September, upon the request of the local advertising club. Under this ordinance goods cannot be advertised by comparing prices unless the lowest former price is given, and advertisements reading "values up to" must contain the number of articles with the various prices.

FOREIGN.

Japan.—The defeat in April of the "dangerous thoughts" bill in the Japanese Parliament was considered a great political victory for Japanese newspapers. The bill would have sent to jail for seven years any one who had thought, was thinking, or might in the future think "dangerous thoughts"—in other words, propaganda against the Government. It applied to the past and the future just as much as to the present. It was said to have been the first time a concerted press demand has shown direct and positive effect in Parliament.

No Boll Weevil Menace Here

The boll weevil has now practically covered the cotton belt of the South, but there is no boll weevil menace in the Albemarle region of North Carolina. Let us send you booklet telling why Elizabeth City, N. IN THE COURTS

CONTEMPT CASES

Case of Right of Newspaper Worker to Withhold Sources of Information from Court, before U. S. Supreme Court.—The progress toward a decision by the United States Supreme Court on whether or not a newspaper reporter or editor has the right to refuse to abide by a court order to divulge the source of published information—in the appeal of Hector Elwell, managing editor of the Milwaukee Wisconsin News, from a decision rendered against him almost three years ago by the Federal Court in Chicago—was watched with much interest in the newspaper world. The case was not reached, however, but it probably will be in 1923. Briefly, the facts of the case are these:

As city editor of the Chicago American, Elwell caused to be published an expose of a certain drug matter, which constituted a good beat. He was called before the grand jury, which happened to sit the day the story was published. Upon questioning Elwell refused to divulge the source of his information. He took the ground that he was honor bound to protect the source of such information. The matter was referred to Judge Carpenter. He ordered Elwell to answer. Elwell refused. He was then adjudged in contempt of court, fined $500 and ordered held in the "common county jail" until he answered. This might be taken by some to mean a life sentence, particularly if a man forgot the source of his information.

On the first appeal Elwell's attorneys attacked the jurisdiction of the grand jury. The court of appeals held against him and the Supreme Court refused to review the decision. A warrant was issued but this move was circumvented by securing a writ of habeas corpus. Judge Fitzhenry, of Bloomington, heard the contention that Elwell was ready to answer but the grand jury had since died and that therefore Elwell was placed in the position of being physically unable to perform what the court ordered. Judge Fitzhenry held against Elwell. The Supreme Court will decide this question. Elwell has not yet served any of his sentence, athough the fine has been paid.

Fined for Refusing to Give Idaho Court Information.—K. E. Torrance, editor of the American Falls (Ida.) Press, was fined $10 for contempt of court when he refused to divulge the name of his informant in a "bootlegging" story. The paper had stated that an interview regarding Prohibition had been obtained with the most prominent bootlegger of the city and gave an intimate description of where and how the liquor was being manufactured.

Sentence of Jail and Fine for Criticism of Court.—Because he openly declared his "disgust" over decisions rendered by District Judge James C. Hume, of Des Moines, which he charged were "filled with puerile personalities" and "presented a strained effort at humor and sensationalism wholly unbecoming a judge," Austin Haines, then editor of the Des Moines (Ia.) News, Scripps-McRae League newspaper, was sentenced, September 30, to serve one day in jail and pay a fine of one dollar. The sentence was imposed by Judge Hume, whose decisions Haines attacked. The case grew out of some comments Haines is said to have made in the News on June 27. It is said that Haines "accused the judge of conduct unworthy of a judicial officer through the nature of his decrees, which, the editor charged, were attempts at sensationalism." Haines was then summoned by Judge Hume to appear before him on a charge of contempt of court. In making the decision at the time of the sentence of Haines, Judge Hume quoted the statutes on contempt as follows: "Contemptuous or insolent behavior toward such court when engaged in the discharge of a judicial duty which may tend to impair the respect due to its authority." Judge Hume said, during the contempt proceedings, that "the defendant chatters glibly about freedom of speech and the liberty of the press, guaranteed by the Constitution. He is unable, apparently, or unwilling, to distinguish between liberty and license. There are limits, even in America, beyond which newspaper editors cannot go. As the court regards it, the defendant in the article complained of has exceeded these limits. * * * In the court's judgment, the defendant is guilty of contempt." The Contempt of Court case against Haines is still pending in the Supreme Court, following the conviction in District Court. The case was immediately appealed, and is now before the Supreme Court. It will probably be several months before a decision with regard to it is made.

Divulging Secret Grand Jury Proceedings.—Judge J. Jerome Hahn, in the Superior Court at Providence, R. I., December 18, stated that in the future any newspaper reporter who wrote and turned over for immediate publication to his paper a story of a secret grand jury indictment before the defendant had been brought into court to plead to the indictment would be subjected to contempt proceedings and penalty would not be a fine. This came up when Jean Sabate, a reporter on the staff of the Providence News, was brought before Judge Hahn for a reprimand for allowing stories to be published in the News before, according to Judge Hahn, they should have been released for publication. Judge Hahn's ruling in effect is: "On a secret indictment there should be no publicity until the defendant appears to answer and even then only such publicity as may be properly given it. For instance, if there were three defendants and only one of them appeared to plead, it would not be proper to mention the other two. It is essential that the work of the grand jury be kept secret at all times until the authorities are ready to make it public."

Forecasting Court Proceedings Forbidden.—Right of a Federal judge to censor reports of proceedings in his court as prepared by reporters for the daily newspapers, was invoked by Judge J. C. Hutcheson of Houston, in July, in the trial of S. E. J. Cox on charges of using the mails in a scheme to defraud. Unexpectedly excusing the jury, but holding every other person in the courtroom, Judge Hutcheson addressed the newspaper men from the bench. He severely arraigned the reporters and newspapers of the city for the reports that had been published covering the progress of the trial, and threatened the reporters and editors with grand jury action if they did not desist in the writing and publishing of such reports. "This is no mock trial," Judge Hutcheson declared. "I shall take grand jury action against reporters and publishers for writing and publishing stories predicting who is going to appear as witnesses and what is going to be done in this trial. Such thing is absolutely prohibited from this time forward."

LIBEL CASES

Mistaken Identity Is Libelous.—Per se a decision containing elements of unusual interest and importance on newspapers' liability libel laws was handed down in April by the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado. The defendant in the case was the Denver Express Publishing Company. The ruling reversed in part and affirmed in part the judgment of Judge Julian H. Moore of the District Court in Denver. The Supreme Court opinion was given by Justice Denison, Chief Justice Scott not participating.

The plaintiff, Ellen Switzer, in error brought suit for libel against Caroline M. Anthony and the Denver Express. The complaint alleged that the defendants conspired to publish the following:

"INSULT THE FLAG, WOMAN SAYS, SO SHE'LL AVENGE IT."

"Mrs. Ellen Switcher, 2036 W. 3rd avenue (meaning the plaintiff herein), called the American flag a dirty rag, according to Mrs. Caroline M. Anthony, a neighbor. Mrs. Anthony's forebears were pioneer American settlers and she immediately protested against the insult to the flag. Then she claims Duncan McPhail, an attorney, got into the argument and sided with Mrs. Switcher (meaning the plaintiff herein). So Mrs. Anthony, Wednesday, asked the district attorney's office to have the two deported as undesirable aliens. She referred to the commissioner of immigration. 'If he doesn't deport them I'll take the matter into my own hands and avenge the flag,' said Mrs. Anthony."

On trial after the evidence on both sides the court directed verdicts for the defendants.

The material facts, as follows, were undisputed:

Mrs. Anthony complained to the deputy district attorney of some misconduct of the plaintiff, Mrs. Switzer, and at the same time said that another woman had referred to the American flag as a "dirty rag." A reporter, in writing the story for the Express, by mistake put Mrs. Switzer in the other woman's place. Neither he nor anybody in connection with the newspaper knew the plaintiff or anything about her, or had any wish to defame her. Mrs. Anthony was shown to have had nothing to do with the libel and was properly discharged.

The Supreme Court's overruling opinion, and reasons therefor, follows:

"We are forced to the conclusion that the direction of the verdict for the defendant, the Express Publishing Company, was erroneous. The court stated the following reasons for its action:

"1, that no conspiracy had been shown as alleged in the complaint;

"2, that the article referred to one Ellen Switcher and was in no way connected with Ellen Switzer;

"3, that no malice or want of good faith had been shown;

"4, that the plaintiff was not the person libeled;

"5, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause for action;

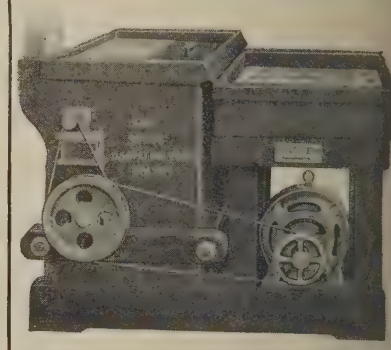
"6, that the statute defined libel as malicious defamation;

"7, that the matter is one of qualified privilege.

"Counsel for the defendant in error adds to this that no damage was shown.

"As to the first ground: The allegations are that the defendant, Anthony, 'did not convey and deliver' to the defendant corporation the libelous matter and that said defendants did contrive and conspire together and did print, publish and circulate of and concerning plaintiff the matter above set forth.

"The gravamen of this charge is, of course, the publication and the allegation that the defendants did or did not conspire to affect the sufficiency of the complaint and the failure to prove it does not constitute a variance, therefore, the first reason given by the court was unsound. Under the old practice the rule might have been otherwise but under our new code one can see no reason for declaring a variance when the real gravamen has been proved. Code 1908, section 84.



"As to the second point—that the article referred to Ellen Switcher and not Ellen Switzer—the court might have added that it described as residing at 2936 W. 3rd avenue, when in fact she resided at 2905 W. 2nd avenue. What the evidence was that there was no such number as 2936 W. 3rd avenue and no such person known as Ellen Switcher, and one witness testified that while she knew the plaintiff and that the proper spelling of her name was Ellen Switzer, she (the witness) pronounced it 'Switcher.' The plaintiff, herself, testified that because of the odium of the charge she was subjected to insult. These things tended to show and would justify the jury in finding that there was an accurate enough description in the alleged libel to identify the plaintiff and that it did identify her and therefore it was for the jury to say whether the defamatory matter was spoken of and concerning the plaintiff, because it was for them to determine what the article meant. Republican Publishing Company vs. Miner 12 Colo., 77, 86.

"In this connection it should be remembered that the fact that neither the reporter nor anybody else connected with the newspaper knew the plaintiff, is immaterial to the right to recover. It is not necessary that they should have known her and have intended to defame her. Upon this point we cannot agree with the case of Hanson vs. the Globe Newspaper Company, 159 Mass., 293, 20 l.r. a, 856 or with the counsel's interpretation of Butler vs. the News-Leader Company, 104 Virginia, P. 51 S. E. 213. The dissenting opinion in Hanson vs. the Globe in our judgment, states the correct law. Intent is immaterial except as a part of express malice.

"The third point—that the plaintiff had shown no malice or want of good faith—is annulled by Meeker vs. the Post, 55 Colorado, 335, 359. Lack of malice alone does not constitute a defense. The true rule, as we understand it, is that express malice may be proved under our statute concerning actionable per se malice sufficient to sustain a judgment is presumed R. M. News vs. Fridborn, 46 Colorado, 440, 446, 2, 7. In this connection see Republican Publishing Company vs. Mosman, 15 Colo., 339. Same vs. Miner, supra.

"The fourth reason—that the plaintiff was not the person libelled—is, in substance, the same as the second.

"In the fifth ground, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, we cannot agree with the court below. The complaint alleges with proper innuendoes, that the article was published of and concerning the plaintiff, code 1908, section 74, and if the article be considered as a statement that the plaintiff called the American flag a dirty rag, it is, we think, libellous per se, because if believed, it was certain to bring upon the plaintiff the contempt and hatred of the community in which she lives, especially in times of patriotic excitement such as prevailed in the fall of 1916, when this publication was made. It is true that the article does not say that Mrs. Switzer did so refer to the flag, but only that Mrs. Anthony had accused her thereof; but it is the same as if the charge had been directly made. Meeker vs. The Post Publishing Company, 55 Colorado, 355, 7, 8; The Republican Publishing Company vs. Miner, 3 Colorado, APP, 568; Morse vs. Times-Republican Publishing Company, 124 Iowa, 707,100 N. W., 867; Bishop vs Journal Newspaper Company, 168 Mass., 327, 47, M. E. 119. See also the authorities cited in 55 Colorado, 358.

"The sixth point, in substance, is the same as the third.

"The seventh reason—that the matter is one of qualified privilege—cannot be sustained. The publication of a legal proceeding is qualifiedly privileged, but not until it has gone into court and thereby become public. Meeker vs. Post Supra. See also Parsons vs Age-Herald Publishing Company, 181 Alabama, 439, 61, 90, 346. Moreover, the qualified privilege permits only the publication of a truthful statement of the matter as it took place in the court. The defendant cannot claim a qualified privilege to say that one has been accused in a legal proceeding when he has not, so even if statements to the district attorney were qualifiedly privileged the publication of the accusation made of another as having been made of the plaintiff would not be drawn within the privileges.

"The fact that no damage was proved, the case being one of libel per se, is immaterial, Republican Publishing Company vs Miner 12 Colo., 86

"The judgment is affirmed as to the defendants, Anthony. As to the defendant, the Denver Express Publishing Company, it is reversed and remanded."

Business Manager Not Responsible.—That a business or circulation manager with no editorial duties is not criminally liable for articles printed in the newspaper in violation of the Minnesota criminal syndication act of 1917, unless he circulates the paper knowing its contents, was the opinion of the Supreme Court in the criminal action against the managing editor and business manager of a newspaper published by the Workers Socialist Publishing Company, of Duluth, Minn. The court held that the verdict of guilty returned against the managing editor of the paper, Tobias Kekkonen, but held that the business manager, A. A. Toivonen, was not guilty and so reversed the jury and the court in that respect. The Supreme Court held further that the managing editor of a newspaper is "criminally liable and responsible for an unlawful publication made in its paper unless the unlawful publication is made under such circumstances as to negative any presumption of privity or connivance or want of ordinary caution on his part to prevent. It is not a defense to merely show that the editor was not aware of the publication. Under this rule the editor was liable criminally in this case."

Candidates for Public Office Make Character and Fitness an Issue.—Decision of not guilty of criminal libel was handed down, October 12, by Judge John H. Burke of Boston Municipal Court in suit brought by John Jackson Walsh against Frederick W. Enwright, publisher of the Boston Telegram. The suit grew out of statements made by the Telegram during the political campaign in which the plaintiff sought the Democratic nomination. Judge Burke said: "Every candidate for public office puts his character and fitness as an issue, and a candidate who invites an attack in a particular direction can hardly complain if his opponents accept the challenge. Counsel for complainant argues that decent men will be driven from politics. It may be hard to find impeccable men—nay, it will be hard—but that cannot change the status of the law as it is. The voters are entitled to know the character of men seeking their votes and it is for them to say how far a proven past offence will be condoned. Defendant discharged."

Liable for Slacker List Errors.—The right of a person whose name has been wrongfully included in a slacker list to sue the newspaper publishing the list for damages was upheld by the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court on January 13 in a case brought against the New York World by one Charles J. Hyman. The decision reversed the lower court. The new ruling holds that:

> "Whatever may be the immunity of the War Department for the publication of the list, and as to this we express no opinion, certainly that immunity did not extend to a newspaper that published it, even though actuated by a sense of duty and for the general good of the State. The privilege, if any, is a qualified and not an absolute one. If any justification exists for the publication, it must be found in facts, which do not appear from the complaint, and which must be asserted as a defense in an answer."

The Hyman suit was the first to be heard of many cases filed in New York and in other states against newspapers which published the War Department slacker lists, and was regarded as a test. Many other claims had been held awaiting its outcome.

Beyond Border of Fairness.—B. F. Looney, former attorney general of Texas, won a long-standing libel suit in Texas Supreme Court in December against A. H. Belo & Co., publishers of the Dallas-Galveston News, when the court upheld a trial court verdict, rendered in 1916, in his favor on account of two editorials and two news articles published in these papers in the early part of 1913. The case, famous in Texas libel proceedings, reached the Supreme Court on the dissenting, minority opinion of the Texarkana Court of Civil Appeals, and the minority decision was upheld, along with the trial verdict. The judgment will be made later by the civil appeals court. The editorials and news articles went beyond the border of "fair comment and criticism of the acts of a public official" and reached the bounds of defamation, under the Texas law, it was held. The opinion was handed down by a special court, two justices disqualifying themselves. It was written by C. L. McCartney, of Brownwood, Tex.

Gets Verdict on Belief That Information Published Was True.—In accordance with instructions from the trial judge, a jury hearing a libel suit brought against the Fresno (Cal.) Morning Republican in May, brought in a verdict in favor of the defendant. The suit was filed over a year ago by Herbert F. Briggs, police court judge, who was charged in an editorial with being lax in his imposition of fines against liquor law violators. A suit for $150,000 damages was filed charging that the official had been libeled. The court held that a verdict for the defendant was returnable if the jury felt that the editor believed the information given him by his investigators was true.

Attorney Would Stop Defendant Paper from Publishing News of Trial of Libel Action Against It.—When the first days of the trial of Mayor Thompson's suit for $500,000 against the Chicago Daily Tribune opened in Chicago, counsel for the mayor questioned the right of the newspaper to print daily the news of the proceedings and then permit the jurors to read the Tribune. The trial judge gave no ruling on the matter.

Plaintiff Loses War-Time Case.—The libel case of Dr. K. Von Schoech against the El Paso (Tex.) Herald was disposed of by the Texas Supreme Court April 29, following appeals from district court and court of civil appeals by the plaintiff. In each of these he was denied recourse. It was held that Dr. Von Schoech had not been libeled by statements published in the El Paso Herald purporting to quote statements that Dr. Von Schoech had registered as a German subject.

Couldn't Prove Published Charge Was False; Loses Case.—By a voluntary non-suit, entered in April in the District Court of Shreveport in the action of Huey P. Long vs. Journal Publishing Company the suit against the Shreveport Journal was dismissed at the instance of the complainant, a member of the Louisiana State Public Service Commission, who had asked for $25,000 damages, claiming that an editorial published on October 5, 1921, was libelous and caused him humiliation. Prior to the motion for non-suit, District Judge J. H. Stephens, of Caddo parish, had held that only in the event the plaintiff could prove that he had not been prosecuted in an action referred to by the editorial, he would have a case.

Fails in Attempt to Collect Damages on Extracts from Article.—A $25,000 libel suit filed by Robert W. Findley, lumberman, against the Knoxville News was ordered stricken from the docket by Judge Huffnaker of the Circuit Court at Knoxville, Tenn., in May, upon demurrer filed by the defense. The News in its demurrer set forth that Mr. Findley's suit falsely alleged that the newspaper had accused him of committing a felony, in an article published January 27 relating to Mr. Findley's speeding in his automobile. The News pointed out that speeding was not a felony, but a misdemeanor. It stated that reference to "fixing up the case in a squire's court" did not refer to Findley, but to another person and that the words did not imply bribery of officials. The News further set forth that the plaintiff extracted only such words from its article as seemed prejudicial to Findley, but did not quote the full article, which would have given its true purport.

Local Merchants Showed a Decided Preference for the Two Principal St. Louis Evening Newspapers

DURING the past year local merchants placed a total of 20,321,400 lines of display advertising in the four St. Louis daily newspapers. Over 95% more was placed in the two important evening papers than in the morning and other evening paper. Daily figures follow:

(Agate Lines)

THE ST. LOUIS STAR 5,421,444

Post-Dispatch (EVENING PAPER) 8,024,625

Globe-Democrat (MORNING PAPER) 3,909,666

The Times (EVENING PAPER) 2,966,385

These figures should interest the National Advertiser. His objective and that of the local advertiser basically are identical. Complete coverage in the zone of distribution at minimum cost, elimination of duplicated circulation and a high return per dollar invested in space are "must" requisites in each case.

The local advertiser has found that the solution to his problem lies in concentrating the bulk of his appropriation in the two principal evening papers—the most conclusive reason why National Advertisers should include,

Knew Statements Untrue, But Intended to Retract Them—"Guilty."—Edwin R. Cornish, editor of the Bay City (Mich.) Workers' Voice, was found guilty, in Federal Court at Bay City, October 19, of contempt of court in having published slanderous and inflammatory articles in his paper regarding Judge Tuttle's issuance of an injunction against the striking shopmen of the Pere Marquette Railway. Mr. Cornish admitted that he knew the statements made in his paper were untrue, but he had not retracted them because he thought the "time was not ripe."

A 24-Cent Verdict Against Newspaper.—Former Mayor Glen Toole of Macon, Ga., was awarded a verdict for 12 cents in July in his suit for $50,000 against the Macon Telegraph. The action was based on publication of an account of an automobile accident in which it was stated the former mayor figured. It was shown that Mr. Toole was in no way connected with the accident. The verdict carried with it liability to the Telegraph of 24 cents, the code providing that in libel suits the costs adjudged against the defendant shall not exceed the amount of damages awarded.

Truth of Publication Plea Upheld.—A verdict for the Pulitzer Publishing Company, publisher of the Post-Dispatch, in a suit for $100,000 damages for libel brought against it by Alroy S. Phillips, former State Senator of Missouri, was unanimously affirmed in February by the State Supreme Court at Jefferson City. The basis of the suit brought July, 1919, was a letter addressed to the editor of the Post-Dispatch in a controversy then in progress over an effort to refer a workmen's compensation act adopted by the 1919 act of the Legislature. The Post-Dispatch pleaded the truth of its publication as a defense, which was upheld.

AFFECTING ADVERTISING

U. S. Supreme Court Decides Twice Against Price-Fixing.—Another attempt to legalize the fixing of resale prices by manufacturers failed January 3, when the U. S. Supreme Court upheld by a vote of five to four the Federal Trade Commission's authority to order the Beechnut Packing Company to cease and desist from carrying into effect its so-called Beechnut policy by co-operative methods in which the company and its distributors, customers and agents undertake to prevent others from obtaining its products at less than the price designated:

"1. By the practice of reporting the names of dealers who do not observe such resale prices.

"2. By causing dealers to be enrolled upon the list of undesirable purchasers who are not to be supplied with the products of the company unless and until they have given satisfactory assurances of their purpose to maintain such designated prices in the future.

"3. By employing salesmen or agents to assist in such plan by reporting dealers who do not observe such resale prices, and giving orders of purchase only to such jobbers and wholesalers as sell at the suggested prices and refusing to give such orders to dealers who sell at less than such prices, or who sell to others who sell at less than such prices.

"4. By utilizing numbers and symbols marked upon cases containing their products, with a view to ascertaining the names of the dealers who sell the company's products at less than the suggested prices, or who sell to others who sell at less than such prices, in order to prevent such dealers from obtaining the products of the company.

"5. By utilizing any other equivalent co-operative means of accomplishing the maintenance of prices fixed by the company."

Another hope that the U. S. Supreme Court might sanction the fixing of resale prices by manufacturers proved without avail when, on January 8, 1923, the court upheld the Federal Trade Commission's order to the Mishawaka Woolen Manufacturing Company to desist from the practice. The Trade Commission order, however, was modified to the limitations placed on the Beechnut Packing Company, which are stated above.

Injunction Protects "Fruit of the Loom" Trademark.—Judge Westenhaver of the U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, at Cleveland, in October granted an injunction to B. B. & R. Knight, Inc., owners of the "Fruit of the Loom" trademark, and to the Ernest Simon Manufacturing Company, its licensee, restraining W. L. Milner & Co., Toledo, from offering for sale shirts other than those made by the licensee and representing them as genuine "Fruit of the Loom" shirts. For 30 years B. B. & R. Knight, Inc., has permitted manufacturers of men's shirts and other garments to use this trade mark on condition that the manufacturer join with the owner of the trademark in guaranteeing quality of the goods the workmanship, design and reliability of the finished article. To this was added an advertised guarantee to refund the purchase price should the consumer be dissatisfied. The defendant contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief because these methods of doing business tended to create a monopoly in restraint of trade and, therefore, they did not come into court with clean hands.

The defendant, unable to obtain "Fruit of the Loom" shirts from the licensee, obtained "Fruit of the Loom" in the bolt, and had shirts made from it by an independent shirt company and others not authorized by the Knight Company to use its trademark. These shirts did not contain the authorized ticket, but were stamped on the neckband, "Fruit of the Loom." The defendant advertised these shirts in local newspapers as "Men's $2.00 Genuine Fruit of the Loom Shirts." Judge Westenhaver said:

"Upon the foregoing facts the law is well settled that the defendant's conduct is unlawful and the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction. The defendant must be found to have intended to produce confusion by the labeling and marking of its shirts, and particularly by its methods of advertising. It must be found to have done so with the wrongful object and purpose of appropriating some part of the plaintiff's trade and good-will and of passing out to the purchasing public its shirts under favor of plaintiff's reputation and good-will built up by many years of labor and advertising."

The court also stated that the defendant had the right to buy "Fruit of the Loom" cloth in bolts and make it up into shirts and sell the shirts made from that cloth, and in doing so it may inform the purchasing public that its product is made of "Fruit of the Loom" cloth provided it does not adopt trademarks or labeling as applied to such shirts or make representations orally or by advertising which may or will confuse the purchasing public as to the origin of its product.

This decision carries the doctrine of the case of Cheney Bros. vs. Gimbel Bros., recently decided in the Southern District of New York, and cited by Judge Westenhaver, one step further in that it protects the owner of a trademark or an unmanufactured cloth and its authorized licensee, even after the cloth has been manufactured into a finished article.

Rights of Taxicabs to Color and Design Trademarks Upheld in Two Cases.—That the adoption of a sentence of painting a taxicab like that used by a rival taxi company is unfair competition is the decision handed down here by Judge Franklin T. Hammond in the equity session of the Massachusetts Superior Court in Boston in May. This decree, which was considered a test decision of far-reaching importance to the advertising world, indicated that where color scheme has been used in such a way as to become associated with a definite service in the mind of the public, such a color scheme will be protected by the courts, even though it is not part of a trademark and even though it is not recorded at Washington. The fact that the plaintiff, the Taxi Service Company, had spent money over a considerable period to identify its Black and White taxicabs and build good will with the public was one of the outstanding factors which enabled it to win its decision over the defendant, William N. Gottman, an individual taxicab driver of Boston. The case was under the jurisdiction of the Suffolk County courts.

The Checker Cab Manufacturing Corporation has the sole right to sell, operate and use for public hire taxicabs done with the checker design used by the Checker Company, according to Judge Robert McC. Marsh in the decision handed down in December in which he also granted the corporation a preliminary injunction against unauthorized imitation of its taxicab color and design. The Checker company had brought suit against Hugh Sweeney in New York Supreme Court. In his decision Judge Marsh said: "The taxicabs manufactured by the plaintiff are known as Mogul and as Checker cabs and are marked by the plaintiff with a distinctive symbol in the form of a design or pattern of checkers of contrasting colors arranged both in circles and also in band running from end to end around the tonneau. This design has been used by the plaintiff for more than a year, and has recently been registered by it as a trademark under Section 367 of the General Business Law. It is not difficult to perceive, however, that if imitations of the plaintiff's cabs may be used without restraint, the plaintiff's market is bound to suffer. Actual loss need not be proved to have already occurred if it is clearly threatened, and when the wrong is clear, the defendant's motive and intent are immaterial. The papers submitted leave no room for doubt that the defendant intentionally copied plaintiff's marking, and * * * he undeniably had in mind the advantage of using that design in competition with the operators who had purchased plaintiff's cabs. Motion for injunction granted."

No Protection for "Thermos" Trademark.—The United States District Court in August was sustained in the United States Court of Appeals in a decision by Judge Anderson against the American Thermos Bottle Company, which had brought suit against the W. T. Grant Company, of Lynn, Mass., New York and elsewhere, for infringement of trademark. The infringement charged was in connection with the use of the word "Thermos" on bottles. When the case was brought up some time ago, Judge Anderson decided that the suing company did not come into court with "clean hands," in that it had advertised its goods as "American made for American people to keep American workmen busy," whereas the court found some of the bottles were procured from Japan, Germany and other sources.

Previously, on February 25, the injunction restraining the W. T. Grant Company from selling at cut price vacuum bottles marked Thermos was dissolved on February 25 by Judge Anderson, in an equity session of the United States District Court at Boston. The Grant company purchased 80,000 bottles which were made in Germany for the American Thermos Bottle Company, of Norwich, Conn., under contract, and which the latter refused to accept. In handing down his decision Judge Anderson scored the American Thermos Bottle Company for its advertising policy of representing its products as American made, while it was buying the glass part of them abroad. He required the bottle company to pay the court costs.

Restrained from Using Name of "Cheney."—Gimbel Brothers, New York department store, were in April restrained, in an order obtained from Federal Judge Augustus N. Hand, from continuing an advertised sale of silks claimed to consist of "22,000 yards of Cheney's Twill and Shower-proof Foulards," and were directed to cease advertising the merchandise in that manner. In the complaint it was alleged that Gimbel Brothers advertised under the heading, "A Sensation, 22,000 Yards of Cheney's Twill and Shower-proof Foulards," followed by representation that these goods are first-quality foulards of the designs and patterns manufactured by Cheney Brothers for this season's trade. Cheney Brothers stated that they had purchased a substantial number of different designs from the goods advertised by Gimbel Brothers, and that in every instance the goods purchased were designs which were prepared by them, for the trade of 1921 or prior to that time. The goods are abandoned designs, says the complaint. Complaint further alleged that Gimbel Brothers were offering for sale in connection with this advertising several pieces of merchandise which were sold by Cheney Brothers last June as "seconds." Following the order of the court noted above, a new order was signed by Judge Hand as a result of a statement by Harry D. Nims, counsel for Cheney Brothers, that the original injunction had been disregarded. The new order provides that until a further order by the court Gimbel Brothers are restrained "from publishing, distributing or circulating directly or indirectly, or directly or indirectly causing to be published, distributed or circulated in any manner any advertisement, circular, statement, sign or other form of publicity which contains or in which appears the names 'Cheney,' 'Cheney silks,' 'Cheney foulards,' or any of them, or the name 'Cheney' in any form used to refer to or describe any textile fabric or in which any direct, indirect or inferential reference is made." The defendants are also restrained from "further exhibition in the windows of defendants' store, Broadway and Thirty-third street, or at any place in the said defendants' store or on the defendants' premises any signs, placards or notices upon which is displayed the word 'Cheney' used in any manner referring to or relating to textile fabrics or connected therewith."

Phonograph Noise Called Public Nuisance.—Noise made by the playing of a phonograph in the doorway of a store, as a means of advertising, may be made the subject of an injunction and damages as a public nuisance, according to a decision, confirmed in September in the Suffolk County (Mass.) Equity Court by Judge DeCourcy. The ruling is considered one of the most novel ever rendered having a bearing upon advertising.

Woodbury "Neckless" Head Trademark Again in Court.—The United States Supreme Court on October 24 handed down a decision denying a writ of certiorari sought by the Andrew Jergens Company against William A. Woodbury Distributors, Inc., Woodbury, Inc., and Woodbury Systems, Inc. The question involved in the suit is the right to use the Woodbury neckless head trademark. William A. Woodbury is a cousin of the late John H. Woodbury, who originated the trademark for use on his toilet articles. Through contracts the Andrew Jergens Company claimed that it has succeeded to all the rights in this trademark and brought suit in Federal Courts to restrain all Woodbury interests from continuing to use this trademark and the manufacture and sale of toilet preparations bearing the Woodbury name. The Federal District Court held that the Woodbury companies had a right to continue to use the Woodbury name on articles not covered by contract with the Andrew Jergens Company. This decision was upheld by the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals and then the action was taken before the Supreme Court through appeal for a writ of certiorari which was denied.

EXCLUSIVE SELLING AGENCIES

Curtis Company's Exclusive Agency Contract Approved by U. S. Supreme Court.—The right of publishers to maintain exclusive selling organizations, and prevent its agents from handling other publications, was upheld by the U. S. Supreme Court in the case of the Federal Trade Commission against the Curtis Publishing Company, of Philadelphia.

The principles involved in the court's decisions are far-reaching and have an effect more or less on all business contracts, upholding, as they do, where nothing else is involved, the right of business concerns to execute so-called "exclusive" arrangements with wholesale agents. The clause of the Curtis Publishing Company's contract as finally objected to by the Trade Commission and submitted to the courts, is as follows:

> "That without the written consent of the publisher, he (the dealer) will not * * * * act as agent for or supply at wholesale rates any periodicals other than those published by the publisher (the respondent named in the complaint)."

The form of contract approved by the U. S. Supreme Court in the Curtis case is as follows:

DISTRICT AGENCY AGREEMENT
Form JDAS

AGREEMENT, Dated ....., 19.., between The Curtis Publishing Company (hereinafter called the Publisher) and ..... (hereinafter called the District Agent).

WITNESSETH, That the District Agent is hereby appointed agent for the sale of the following publication of the Publisher, viz.: The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman for the following territory, viz.:

upon the following terms and conditions:

1. Commencing with the issues of The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman dated ..... and with The Ladies' Home Journal for the month of ....., or with later issues at the Publisher's option, the Publisher will supply and consign to the agent such stock of the above publication as the Publisher finds the District Agent requires from time to time, provided the requisitions therefor are sent by the District Agent according to the schedule issued by the Publisher, at times sufficiently in advance of publication to effect the proper delivery thereof, and provided such requisitions specifying the desired number of copies of each publication are sent upon the printed requisition blanks of the Publisher, and provided the District Agent has faithfully and punctually kept, up to the time of each requisition, the terms and conditions of this agreement. The title of said publications shall remain with the Publisher until they are sold by the District Agent. The said publications are to be forwarded by the Publisher to the District Agent (transportation charges prepaid) by mail, express or freight, at the option of the Publisher, at times intended to effect delivery to the District Agent one day before the authorized publication dates as fixed from time to time by the Publisher.

2. The District Agent will supply to boys and dealers copies of The Saturday Evening Post and of the Country Gentleman at the net wholesale rate of three (3c.) a copy for sale at five cents (5c.) a copy, and copies of The Ladies Home Journal at eleven cents (11c.) a copy for sale at fifteen cents (15c.) a copy, and will make deliveries of each of the said publications early in the morning of the authorized publication day thereof. All retail sales made by the District Agent shall be only at the prices of five cents (5c.) a copy for The Saturday Evening Post and for The Country Gentleman, and fifteen cents (15c.) a copy for The Ladies' Home Journal. All sales must be for cash or at the risk of the District Agent.

3. The District Agent agrees that he will at his own expense provide a suitable place and appliances for the sale and the distribution of the said publications; that he will use all reasonable efforts and devote the necessary time for promoting the sale of said publications and supplying the demand therefor; that without the written consent of the Publisher he will not display, deliver or sell any copies of any one of said publications before the authorized publication date as specified in the printed requisition blanks, or dispose of any copies of said publication in the territory of any other District Agent or Special Agent of the Publisher, or act as agent for or supply at wholesale rates any periodicals other than those published by the Publisher, or directly or indirectly furnish to any other publisher or agent the names and addresses of the persons to whom the Publishers' publications are sold or delivered, or allow any one to stamp, paste or otherwise place on or in any of the Publisher's publications or any part thereof any advertising matter, except that he may stamp his name as agent thereon and may insert circulars intended solely to increase the single-copy sale of the said publications.

4. The District Agent shall, subject to the direction and the control of the Publisher, train, instruct and supervise such adequate force of boys within his district as has been or shall be organized by or under the instructions of the Publisher for the purpose of distributing the said publications.

Chicago Tribune Exclusive Selling Plan Upheld by U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals.—U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in Chicago, affirmed finding of former Judge Landis that the Chicago Tribune had not violated the law in instructing its carriers that if they sold the Chicago Journal of Commerce they could not sell the Tribune. Judge Landis had held that the Tribune had built up its carrier system at great expense through many years and refused to enjoin it. Counsel for the Tribune revealed, in connection with the case, that the Tribune's expenditures in building up its carrier system approximated $5,000,000 in the last decade.

GENERAL

Newspaper Story Held to Be Conclusive Evidence.—An independent investigation of a murder mystery conducted by the staff of the Pontiac (Mich.) Daily Press, and testimony given by Judd J. Robbins, a reporter, at the trial of Anson Best for strangling a telephone operator, were held by the state supreme court in April to have been conclusive evidence of the guilt of the man. He made a confession, then repudiated it and said it was obtained by threats and promises. The newspaper men interviewed him prior to the repudiation and checked up on his story. They found a girl's handkerchief where he said in his confession he had thrown it away and this bit of evidence figured largely in the case. Best appealed after getting a life sentence but the Supreme Court refused a new trial.

Lucky Name Prize Contest Not a Lottery.—An attempt by the postmaster to bar the Chicago Tribune from the mails, on the ground that its "Lucky Name" contest now running is a lottery, was temporarily restrained February 21 by Federal Judge K. M. Landis. The Tribune's attorneys, in their petition to Judge Landis, contended that the so-called horoscope casting or "Lucky Name" contest was not a lottery but rather an aid to public education in that it shows the derivation of names; furthermore, that the contest was not a lottery because anyone could enter it whether a subscriber to the Tribune or only the purchaser of a single copy or not the purchaser of a copy of the Tribune at all.

Paper Company Must Live Up to Contract.—In a decision handed down April 20 by the Appellate Division of the New York State Supreme Court the Remington Paper and Power Company, of Watertown, N. Y., will have to account to the Sun Printing and Publishing Association of New York for damages of $1,500,000 claimed by the Sun Company for breach of contract for the delivery of newsprint paper in 1920. It was charged that the defendant declined to be bound by its contract when the market price of newsprint reached unprecedented heights. The defendant claimed that the contract was invalid by reason of a technicality. The decision of the Appellate Division reversed an opinion of the lower court.

N. Y. Times Did Not Infringe Philadelphia Ledger Copyright in Grey Letter.—The United States Supreme Court in April refused to review the decision of the lower court in the action brought by the Philadelphia Public Ledger against the New York Times, the decision of Illinois newspapers, like Illinois farms, are productive and advertisers who cultivate them consistently and intelligently will find them profitable producers of wealth.

Let a daily message reach over 6,000,000 people, telling them about your business proposition, and what you have to offer and the special advantages of your offer.

Land value of Illinois is $115.00 per acre, second highest of all states. Eighty-nine per cent of all land is in farms and 85 per cent is improved farm lands.

In manufacturing Illinois ranks near the top, having 18,594 factories employing over 805,000 people and producing over $5,400,000,000 worth of manufactured goods annually.

No other state has as many banks as Illinois with 1,339 organized as National Banks and 869 as State Banks. National Banks have 1,206,442 deposit accounts.

Over six million successful people in the state have four times six million wants every week from mowing machines to motor cars and from furs to fireless cookers.

It is an extremely attractive state for advertisers. The tremendous circulations of the many newspapers in this state present a total number of prospective buyers that should appeal to all national advertisers.

Study the newspapers and cities listed below separately, then cover them together, and you practically blanket the State of Illinois.

the lower court being that the Times had not infringed the copyright of the Ledger by printing in this country a letter by Sir Edward Grey originally printed in the London Times of January 31, 1920. The Times was thereby cleared of the allegation. No comment on its action was made by the Supreme Court other than the formal legal phrase "petition for writ of certiorari denied." The suit in question was brought in the Federal Court for the Southern District of New York after the New York Times printed the Grey letter February 1, 1920. The Ledger contended that it had exclusive rights to publish articles from the London Times in the United States and that the Times acted unlawfully when it printed the Grey statement, which the London correspondent of the New York Times obtained permission from the office of the London Times to cable to the New York Times after it had appeared in the London Times. Two allegations were made by the Ledger, first that the Times had infringed the copyright and second that there had been unfair trade competition. The District Court dismissed the first complaint, but the second was left to stand and is yet undecided. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals sustained the lower court in a formal opinion, and the Ledger appealed to the Supreme Court, taking the first complaint to this tribunal and setting forth that it could not press its case with regard to the second count until the first was decided.

Fine for Stealing Newspaper from Doorstep.—Ed. Munsey, an Ogden (Utah) newspaper and magazine dealer, was fined $50 in the City Court in June for the theft of a newspaper from an apartment house doorstep. He was convicted upon testimony of a carrier for the Ogden Standard-Examiner, who testified that he saw Munsey take the paper. Munsey had been fined $25 once before for a similar offense.

Public Printing Must Be Done Within State.—Attorney General Robertson of Mississippi rendered decision that no money can be legally paid out of the state or county treasury for printing of any kind done outside the state for any state or county officer institution, college, school or department.

Monotype Wins Two Points in Case Against Patent Elrod Typecaster.—The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Third Circuit, in a decision rendered June 17, upheld the Lanston Monotype Machine Company of Philadelphia in two of its claims of infringement of patents made against the Pittsburgh Type Founders Company of Pittsburgh arising from the marketing by the latter of the Elrod Casting Machine. The case had been in the courts for several years and came before the Court of Appeals on appeal by the Lanston company from a decision rendered some time ago by the U. S. District Court in Delaware to the effect that the Elrod machine was not an infringement in any way on the Monotype. The decision of the Court of Appeals declared the mould of the Elrod machine an infringement on the Monotype but dismissed the claim of the plaintiff with regard to the Elrod device, which cuts into suitable lengths the strips produced by the machine, on the ground that the court is unable to find that it involves invention and that the patents for it lack validity. The costs in the court were assessed two-thirds for the defendant and one-third for the plaintiff. The Delaware court's decision was ordered amended. The U. S. Court of Appeals for the 3d District, sitting in Washington, subsequently awarded the Lanston Company an injunction against the Pittsburgh Type Founders Co., for infringements of patents.

Injunction Stops Newspaper Presses After Eleven P. M.—The Amerikai Magyar Nepszava, a Hungarian morning newspaper of New York, was restrained from operating its pressroom after eleven o'clock at night as soon as a temporary injunction granted to Jonah Goldstein by Justice Marsh in special term of the Supreme Court was made permanent. Goldstein, whose home abuts on the extension housing the newspaper's pressroom, complained that the noise and vibration of the machinery made comfort impossible in his home.

Advertiser Has Exclusive Right to Picture.—The Fitzgerald Manufacturing Company, New York, won its case against Mollie King, motion picture star, in action against her to enforce its contract for the exclusive use of her photograph and facsimile signature in connection with its advertisement of the Star Electric Vibrator manufactured by the company. The Court of Appeals, sitting in Albany, N. Y., dismissed her appeal from a judgment of $2,863.83 obtained against her by default as damages for breach of the contract. The Fitzgerald company paid Miss King $1,000 for the exclusive use of her photograph for a year and it was used in many advertisements illustrating the use of the vibrator. The company alleged she had broken her contract by giving the Wells and Richardson Company, of Burlington, Vt., permission to use her photograph on the "Diamond Dye Girl Calendar" for 1920. Also that her publicity agent used her photographs in many publications in connection with her activities. Miss King recently obtained an order to open her default and permit her to defend the action, which the Appellate Division, third department, reversed and its decision is now affirmed. Her defense was that the use of her photograph in other publications and in connection with other advertising made her more widely known and increased her value as an advertising feature.

Dollar "Package Sale" Ads Held to Violate U. S. Lottery Laws—The Federal Court in Lincoln, Neb., ruled that so-called "Dollar Package Sale" advertisements, which many newspapers throughout the country have been printing for reputable jewelry firms (carrying statements that some of the packages contain articles valued as high as $50), are violations of the U. S. Lottery Laws and that publishers circulating them are liable to prosecution and punishment. The Lincoln State Journal Company and the Star Publishing Company, which published a few of these advertisements in Lincoln, were indicted, on complaint of a post office inspector, and fined $50 by the Federal Court.

Published Picture of U. S. Currency.—A test of a newspaper's liability to prosecution for transgressing the Federal Laws prohibiting the printing of copies of U. S. currency and stamps was begun in November before the Federal Grand Jury in Providence, R. I., with the publishers of the Providence Evening News as the defendants. The Evening News on October 20 published photographs of three $500 bills, which it charged figured in an alleged attempt at political bribery. Secret service agents immediately seized the engraving plates and investigated the circumstances under which the pictures were published. The law covering the case is that of "Crimes Against Currency, Using Plates to Print Notes Without Authority," which provides:

> "Whoever shall print, photograph, or in any other manner make or execute or cause to be printed, photographed, made or executed, or shall aid in printing, photographing, making, or executing any engraving, photograph, print or impression in the likeness of any obligation or other security, or any part thereof . . . except under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury or some other proper officer of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 15 years or both."

The case has not yet come to trial.

Right to Establish Rival Publication Upheld.—The right to establish a rival publication that is intended to be destructive to another publication is absolute, according to a decision of the Appellate Division, Third Department of New York, handed down March 17 in affirming the decision of former Justice Albert H. Sewell in dismissing the complaint of Guy W. Beardsley to recover $500,000 damages from Willis Sharpe Kilmer and Jerome B. Hadsell, owners and publishers of the Binghamton (N. Y.) Press. The decision of the Court lays down a new rule of law, that the right of competition is self-justification always, even though a rival publication is started for the sole purpose of destroying another and with no thoughts of business profits to be derived. The decision was made by a divided Court with Justice Harold J. Hinman dissenting, and it is expected a further appeal will be taken to the Court of Appeals. Mr. Beardsley was the publisher of the Binghamton Herald and Mr. Kilmer one of the manufacturers of "Swamp Root," a proprietary medicine, made in Binghamton. The Kilmer Company withdrew its advertising from the Herald and Beardsley began a series of editorial attacks on Swamp Root. Mr. Kilmer and Mr. Hadsell then started the Binghamton Press with the avowed purpose of putting the Herald out of business. A conspiracy was alledged for this purpose in 1903 and after attempting to meet the competition Beardsley was forced to suspend publication in 1910. He alleged his advertisers and subscribers were solicited and lower rates offered, his employees induced to leave his service for more pay on the rival paper and that unfair methods were used to destroy his business. Action was not brought until 1914 and came to trial in 1916 when his complaint was dismissed on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. The appeal from this decision did not come up for argument until the 1922 January term of the Appellate Division.

Attempt to Suppress News by Injunction.—An attempt to suppress news by court injunction, before the news was printed, was tried in New York February 20. It failed. At four o'clock Monday morning a member of the composing-room "lobster shift" of the New York Globe was served with papers in a preliminary injunction restraining the Globe from printing certain news stories about the firm of Randolph Rose & Son, cotton brokers, written by Harry F. Guest, of the Globe staff. Then, at 9.30 the same morning another set of papers of the same injunction was served on Jason Rogers, publisher of the Globe. At ten o'clock the same morning, the hour set for the hearing of the application for the injunction, Hays & Wadhams, attorneys for Randolph Rose & Son, failed to file with the court the proper return of service and the matter was thrown out. After this, Engelhard, Pollak, Pitcher & Sterns, attorneys for the Globe, in writing, agreed to waive this as a technical error and asked that the hearing be restored to the court calendar and set for the same time the next day. Again counsel for Randolph Rose & Son failed to file the affidavit of service and the action was dismissed.

Court Settles Ownership of Newspaper.—Controversy over the ownership of the Klamath Falls (Ore.) Record was settled in May by the circuit court, which found that the 60-day option of E. J. Murray is valid. The court ordered delivery of all the common stock of the paper to him upon payment of $1,000. Both the Record and Klamath Falls Herald claimed ownership of the paper and a dispute has been going on since last October. Don. Belding and W. A. Wiest, who have had possession of the Record plant, have held that the option held by E. J. Murray was invalid.

With seven and a half per cent of America's population within her boundaries, New England furnishes 40 per cent of the Nation's savings deposits.

This means that a large percentage of the population of each state in this group represents savings bank depositors, as is shown by the following table:

Massachusetts	67%
New Hampshire	58%
Connecticut	54%
Vermont	33%
Maine	31%
Rhode Island	27%

Moreover nearly forty per cent of the people own their own homes. This New England territory offers the greatest market for intensive advertising by daily newspapers. The accompanying list will furnish an unparalleled choice of result producing newspapers.

WEST VIRGINIA

"AN EMPIRE OF WEALTH"

The three most necessary minerals to industry—coal, petroleum and gas—comprise more than 90 per cent of the state's mineral output.

West Virginia contains over 30 per cent of all natural gas land acreage and stands first with a production exceeding $50,000,000.

The coal wealth of West Virginia has hardly been scratched. It is now producing over 87,000,000 tons annually and it can be truthfully said that the mining industry is still in its infancy.

The lumber industry of West Virginia adds in excess of $15,000,000 to the buying power of the state annually.

Climatic conditions combined with high fertility of the soil make possible the widely diversified and abundant farm crops of West Virginia. The annual value of the farm crops is in excess of $112,845,000.

West Virginia is the richest area of its size in natural resources and its per capita buying mounts near to the top.

Be a big advertiser among these prosperous people by a comparatively small expenditure in daily newspaper advertising.

IOWA

The manufactures of Iowa are largely based upon the products of the farm—that is, crops and livestock.

Remember that ninety per cent of the people live on hard surface highways that connect all the market towns of 1,000 or more.

In addition to the wealth and prosperity of a community, it is necessary that the advertiser also consider the distribution and communication facilities of the territory he wishes to cover.

A glance at the map of Iowa will show the gigantic network of railroads, and the extent of possible telegraphic communication. It does not, however, reveal the fact that on the farms of Iowa there are 183,852 telephones—or one for every two farms in the state.

In addition to having the largest percentage of total automobiles Iowa leads in the number of automobiles owned on farms.

Aside from being an indication of the prosperity and buying power of the state; this also serves as an indication of the tremendous market possibilities.

To the National advertiser Iowa offers the greatest prize for good advertising—good business.

There is buying power in the South's great agricultural resources. It is no longer "The Land of Cotton" but a land of wealth and prosperity brought about by a greater variety of crops and adapting production to its climatic and soil conditions.

There is buying power in the increasing industrial activity of the South. The last census shows an increase of 138 per cent in capital invested and 210 per cent in value of products manufactured. The value of her manufactured products totaled in excess of 9 billion dollars last year.

The livestock industry grew along with the rapid advance made in agricultural pursuits. This industry alone adds wonderfully to the South's great buying power and will continue to do so because of the fact that the South possesses the advantage of all around grazing.

The South has also turned to the manufacturing of her metals, the refining of her petroleum, making of coke, utilizing her own lumber, and the development of her water power.

All of this is bound to increase to a greater degree, the purchasing power of not only the South, but of the entire nation.

THE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT OF INDIANA

First among the forces that have combined to make possible industrial development in Indiana must be put the geographical location.

Included within her borders is the center of population and the center of manufacturing for the United States as a whole.

Moreover the state touches the Great Lakes and lies across the path of the great trunk lines of railroads with branches to every corner of the State. Railroad mileage exceeds 7,500 miles. Besides steam roads, electric interurban traffic is the heaviest in the country.

Its manufactures include automobiles, machinery, furniture, steel, pianos, phonographs, tinplate, oil refining and meat packing. All this means that the people of Indiana are assured of steady work, high wages and profitable business for every one.

Indiana ranks sixth in coal production and twelfth in petroleum production.

The following Indiana dailies intensively cover merchandising areas that will profit you.

Newsboy Regulations.—That newsboys are not employees of newspapers and therefore the paper is not liable under the Minnesota compensation act for injuries sustained was the testimony of the circulation manager of the Duluth News-Tribune in the trial of Daniel St. Armour as father of Louis St. Armour, aged 15, against the Duluth Street Railway Company, in March, in a Duluth district court. He explained that newsboys, practically speaking, were their own employers in that they purchased and sold papers of their own free will. This newsboy who had a "badge" permitting him to sell papers on the street cars injured his hand when the doors of the car closed on it, and he sought to recover $6,250. A verdict was returned for the car company. Testimony in this case showed that the newspaper was permitted to have newsboys on the street car without paying for the privilege. So the newspaper was interested in the case because of possibility of a claim against it had the verdict been against the street car company.

Newsboys under the age of 16 are prohibited from selling papers on the streets on days when school is in session, under the provisions of the new Virginia child labor law, which became effective June 18. Boys under the age of 12 are debarred from selling papers on the street at any time. All newsboys will be required to procure a badge from the school authorities. Boys under 16 will not be permitted to sell papers before 6 a. m. or after 7 p. m. on any day. The law does not apply to boys delivering papers or magazines on regular routes.

Racing News Publication Upheld.—Press associations and newspapers are entitled to circulate reports of race results, Judge William Hurley of the Cook County (Ill.) Criminal Court ruled on March 29. The decision was made in the trial of officials of the General News Bureau, charged with conspiracy to commit a crime against public morals by selling race results to its clients. M. J. Tennes, H. S. Argo and John Morelock, officials of the company, were arrested a year before on the charges. After the prosecution had presented its evidence, intended to show conspiracy to violate the law, Judge Hurley announced that it was unnecessary for the defense to present any evidence. "I will instruct the jury to bring in a verdict of not guilty," he said, "if the case is carried to a conclusion. No law has been violated. There is no statute which prevents a press association from carrying the race results, any more than it prevents the presentation of any other sport." The state's attorney agreed to dismissal of the charges.

Entanglements about whether daily newspapers of Michigan can or cannot print racing results, which has been in several courts for months, were temporarily solved in September by the granting of an injunction restraining the police from interfering with Daily Racing Form, a Detroit race track publication, issued by Louis Grosscup. The injunction will hold until the supreme court of this state rules on the constitutionality of a law prohibiting publication of race results. Meantime newspapers are printing results and odds in full.

FOREIGN

French Law of Right of Reply.—An action in the French courts by a weekly journal, Les Echos de l'Exportation, against another weekly, L'Exportateur Français, in May, brought once more before the public the interesting French law of the right of reply. This law says that where a person is specifically named or indicated in an article, the newspaper or periodical publishing such article must, if called upon to do so, print in the identical position in which the first article appeared a reply thereto by the person named or indicated. The person replying has the right to twice the space of the article to which he replies, and should his reply go beyond that, he can be called upon to pay for such excess only the rates the paper charges for insertion of legal notices. Overzealous patriotism caused the Exportateur Français in one of its articles to treat a member of the staff of Les Echos de l'Exportation a little too violently. The latter immediately claimed the right of reply afforded by the law. At first, the Exportateur Français refused to insert his reply. When eventually it did insert it comment was added which only aggravated matters. The affair then went before the court, which fined the Exportateur Français Fr. 20,000 for libel and ordered that paper to print the judgment in its columns. Should the offending journal hesitate to insert the finding of the court, its proprietors are liable to an additional fine of Fr. 1,000 (about $100) for every issue published not containing the judgment.

IN THE CANADIAN COURTS

Newspaper Responsible for Advertising, as Well as Reading Matter in Its Columns.—That a newspaper must assume full responsibility for all matter published in its columns, whether reading matter or advertising, was the finding of the Superior Court in Montreal, in March, in the action of Elie Napoleon Turner against La Patrie for defamatory libel: Turner sued on the ground that the newspaper had published statements of a libelous nature. The paper denied responsibility, declaring that the statements had appeared in a paid advertisement inserted on the authority of the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec. The court held that the newspaper could not be excused for publishing the name of Turner in an injurious and defamatory article, even under the authorization of the Minister of Agriculture, and granted plaintiff $100 damages.

Publishers Win Newsprint Excess Price Case.—Appeal of the Fort Frances Pulp & Paper Company from the judgment of Justice Riddell in the case of the Winnipeg (Man.) Free Press and other western Canada newspapers against the company, was dismissed with costs. The newspapers sought to recover $125,000 alleged to have been paid the paper company in excess of prices fixed by the Paper Controller or Paper Control Board during the war. The Fort Frances Company counter-claimed, on the ground that the statutes and orders-in-council under which the paper controller and paper control board acted were "ultra vires," and demanded $2,430,000, the alleged difference between the market price and the price at which it had been compelled to furnish paper. Judge Riddell dismissed the counter-claim and gave judgment in favor of the newspapers. The appeal court found that paper was supplied to the plaintiffs on the terms that the price was provisional, "to be adjusted according to prices fixed by the tribunal." No matter what the means were by which the appellants were forced to take those terms, they entered into contracts for the supply of paper at those prices. Having entered into the contracts, there was no escape. They were bound to adhere to them whether the tribunal was legitimate or not.

Guessing Contests Banned.—Baseball guessing contests conducted by several newspapers in Western Canada were pronounced illegal by the Manitoba Court of Appeals.

Montreal Star Wins Long Standing Libel Case.—A legal victory for the Montreal Star Publishing Company, Ltd., was recorded in a judgment handed out on April 25 by the Court of Appeals, finally settling litigation which had been in progress since 1912 between The Star, Lyons Cut Rate Drug Stores, Ltd., and Lea Jubinville, formerly head of the firm, then known as Lyons Cut Rate Drug Stores. Mrs. Jubinville took action against The Star in 1912 for damages, and judgment was given against her with costs. The case was taken to the Court of Review, and the judgment confirmed. The Star then claimed payment of costs from Mrs. Jubinville, and she replied that she had nothing with which to pay the claim. She stated that she had sold her business, run under the name of Lyons Cut Rate Drug Store, to the firm of Lyons Cut Rate Drug Stores, Ltd. The Star seized 45 shares in the latter company owned by Mrs. Jubinville, and had them sold, raising $202.50 thereby. This was not sufficient to meet the bill of costs. The Star further claimed that Lyons Cut Rate Drug Stores, Ltd., owed Mrs. Jubinville $45,000 worth of stock in the company, and took action to force the company to issue these stocks, so that she might be able to pay the full bill of costs. Dame Jubinville and the company contested this action, saying that she had abandoned her right to any further interest in the company, some time before the judgment was rendered. The Star maintained that this abandoning of her rights and interests in the company was fraudulent, and claimed that it should be set aside. The Superior Court, however, held that the abandoning of interest in the company was regular, and turned down the Star's petition. Against this decision the Star appealed, and the Appeal Court, in rendering final judgment, upheld the Star's contention, declaring that there was "apparent fraud" in the ceding by Dame Jubinville of her interest in the Cut Rate Drug Store business.

SUPREME!

THE UNQUESTIONABLE supremacy of one economical advertising medium simplifies the task of the advertiser in The Chicago Territory. The surpassing leadership of The Chicago Tribune was never more conclusively demonstrated than during 1922 when

¶ THE TRIBUNE gained a total of 10,671 columns—which was larger than the combined gains of the other five papers.

¶ THE TRIBUNE'S gain in display advertising was twice that of the other five papers combined.

¶ THE TRIBUNE printed more want advertising than the other five papers combined.

THE SOUTH

With Numerous Buying Resources Is An Excellent Market

The South is one of the most inviting trade sections in the United States. Cotton no longer holds the South in its power. Watermelons, cantaloupes, strawberries, grapes, peaches, tomatoes, apples and other fruits are bringing gold and silver to the banks of the South.

Sweet potatoes, lettuce, cabbages, peas, corn and other Southern vegetables are "selling the South in the Northern markets."

Cattle that awaken the envy of Northern and Western herdsmen feed and fatten on alfalfa while Northern live stock are expensive luxuries in the barnyards of New England and New York State.

National advertisers and space buyers should stop to realize these conditions all of which added to the fast developing Southern manufacturing interests are creating wealth and prosperity that assure the successful marketing of properly advertised products for personal and household consumption in "the land of opportunity."

Come down and see our cities—markets and manufacturing centers that will surprise and please you. Get in touch with the newspapers listed on this page and become aroused to a genuine constructive selling campaign in the South.

THE PRESS regularly publishes more Men's Clothing advertising than either The News or daily Plain Dealer.

The figures for the entire year of 1922 are as follows:

THE PRESS .....795,473 Lines
Plain Dealer.....652,259 Lines
The News.....533,716 Lines

Not only is THE PRESS first in local advertising—the local merchant's first choice—but in total paid advertising as well. Here is conclusive, definite and authoritative proof of the complete local supremacy of THE PRESS.

79 Per Cent of THE PRESS total circulation of 182,548 is distributed in Greater Cleveland. It is significant that THE PRESS stands fourth in the entire country in the highly important factor of intensive coverage.

OLD SIN OF U. S. PRESS AGONIZING THE WORLD

Secret Treaties Among Allies, Foundation of Versailles Treaty and Responsible for Europe's Present Welter, Were Known in 1917, But Were Printed in Full By Only One American Newspaper

By IRVING BRANT

Editor of the Editorial Page, St. Louis Star

HE United States accepted the war on trust. Defined in its larger as- s by the aims and methods of Ger- militarism, the cause of the Allies so overwhelmingly right that any stioning of collateral motives became cult. It would have sullied our high lism to have demanded evidence of al health from our associates. We ld have been like an affianced bride ng to her intended, "George, I trust ; show me a certificate from your or."

o emphasize the extent to which we the war, or rather the peace, on t, let us suppose that in the summer 1917, some American, gifted with rnatural prescience, had made an ex- statement of the condition of the ld in 1923, as it would result from man defeat and Allied victory. Is it much to say that with one unani- is voice all loyal Americans would e cried, "To Leavenworth with him"? a matter of cold probability, isn't it ly that the maker of such a prophecy ld have been convicted of sedition would be in prison at this moment? uch was the American attitude at the nning of the war, and it did honor to spirit, if not to our intelligence. wledge of the secret Macchiavellian ed of the statesman and business ips who made the peace would not, let ope, have caused the United States to ribute to the triumph of the Hohen- erns. That would have been jump- from bonfire to hellfire. But it would e forced the Allies to throw out y project except winning the war the sake of peace. It would have le American ideals supreme at Ver- es.

Ve may heap anathema upon a State artment which was as criminally ig- nt as our own in April, 1917, but so as the American people were con- ed, they had no means of determining truth, and the newspapers were too with the surface of the war to bur- beneath it.

oday everybody realizes that the htful condition of the world is the rowth of ambitions which were nur- d by Allied statesmen throughout the growing constantly in depth and e, defined and redefined in secret ties.

e war was fought in the sunshine; the festered in darkness.

he curse of the American people is those who sold the victory they won. ey had but known in time!

ow let the newspapers of America the plain facts. The secret treaties put before them in 1917, and they d their columns against them. Every rtant secret agreement which rose o plague President Wilson during eace conference could have been dis- ited and destroyed if the newspapers merica had stuck to their business rinting the truth.

he inescapable truth is that the news- rs of America voluntarily censored suppressed the most important dip- atic news given to the world be- n the declaration of war and the ng of peace. They did so for patri- otic reasons, but they were false to their profession, and they guessed wrong. That act of suppression is responsible for the failure of victory to bring peace.

The rivalry, the greed, the hatred, the bankruptcy, the chaos of the world today date squarely back to the refusal of American newspapers to publish the secret treaties and deal with them as a living issue of the war period.

Ray Stannard Baker, in "Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement," has furnished a vivid picture of the part played by these secret agreements.

"Though conditions had radically changed in the course of the war," he says, "though America had come in and American principles had been universally accepted . . . even though the secret treaties had been in some instances disclaimed, yet the demands set forth during the peace conference by the various nations were exactly the claims made in these various very secret treaties."

And again, says Mr. Baker:

"But without an understanding of these treaties there can be no true understanding of what really happened at Paris. Two of the great conflicts there, the Italian and Japanese settlements, turned largely upon the existence of secret treaties, and the black trail of the serpent of secret diplomacy of the earlier days of the war also disfigured the discussions of the disposition of the Turkish colonies and the settlements in Turkey and played a part in nearly every other important controversy.

"It was the most insidious single element working against full publicity of the proceedings, for it involved purposes which the European powers dared not discuss in public. It cramped and hampered the experts, it caused the European councillors themselves to play fast and loose with each other. Nothing in the voluminous records of the Council of Ten and Council of Four at Paris is more impressive than the amount of time—invaluable time, priceless energy—devoted to trying to devise methods of getting around or over or through these old secret entanglements."

Briefly, the secret treaties were:

Agreement with Russia, March 20, 1915, by which Russia was to get Constantinople and the Straits; the demands of Great Britain and France "both within the confines of the Ottoman Empire and in other places" were to be satisfied; Great Britain was to get oil zone in Persia.

Treaty of London, April 16, 1915, by which Italy came into the war with the promise of the Trentino, Trieste, Gorizia, Gradisca, the Tyrol with 200,000 Germans; the Slav province of Dalmatia, Adriatic islands, African territories and an indemnity.

Rumanian treaty of August, 1916, promising that country Transylvania, having a Rumanian and Magyar population, and the Banat, a Slav province. This treaty was chiefly to be kept secret from Serbia, as it involved a territorial intrigue against that valiant member of the Allies.

Sykes-Picot treaty of May, 1916, giving Syria to France, Mesopotamia to Great Britain, dividing Arabia into British and French spheres of influence, and excluding Italy from any Turkish rights.

Sazanov-Paleologue treaty, March, 1917, giving northern Asiatic Turkey to Russia, and southern Turkey to France, with a line of demarcation to be agreed upon between France and Great Britain.

Franco-Russian agreement of March 11, 1917, giving France the River Rhine as "a permanent strategical frontier" and allowing Russia to annex Poland.

Japan's secret treaty, covering the German rights in Shantung and the German islands north of the equator, was signed March 1, 1917.

In April, 1917, the agreement of St. Jean de Maurienne promised Smyrna and other Turkish territory to Italy.

The last secret agreement was that of February 15, 1919 (at the Peace Conference) revising the Sykes-Picot treaty to transfer Mosul from the French to the British zone, and giving Palestine to Great Britain.

These treaties, it will be noticed, are of two varieties—bids for support, and divisions of spoil. The Allies outbid Germany for Italian support because Germany could not offer Austrian territory to Italy. Germany outbid the Allies for Rumania, but Rumania thought the Allies could deliver and Germany couldn't. Japan held up the Allies when they needed sea power against submarines.

The secret treaties dividing the spoils in Asia and Africa were entered into, for the most part, early in the war, yet some of them were signed after the Allies had issued their statement of war aims of January 10, 1917, indorsing the right of self-determination and a league of nations. The public statements of Lloyd George and others, echoing the principles of President Wilson, lulled American public opinion to sleep. They deceived Mr. Wilson himself. Yet the proof of their insincerity is not alone the resurrection of the earlier secret treaties in the Peace Conference; the secret treaty-making, for the division of territorial spoils, continued right along after the restatement of war aims. The last secret treaty, giving Mosul to England, was signed at the Peace Conference itself.

The extent of American ignorance can be measured from the following colloquy between Senator Borah and President Wilson, at the White House conference, August 19, 1919:

"Senator Borah—When did the secret treaties between Great Britain, France and the other nations of Europe with reference to certain adjustments in Europe first come to your knowledge? Was that after you reached Paris also?

"The President—Yes, the whole series of understandings were disclosed to me for the first time then."

When the President made this amazing statement, some editorial critic remarked that there was no excuse for his ignorance, because the secret treaties were published in full in the New York Evening Post during the winter of 1917-18. If the President was to be blamed for not knowing what was published in the New York Evening Post, what is to be said of the thousands of newspapers and their editors, who ignored both the news value and the significance of what one newspaper was courageous enough to publish? Why was the New York Evening Post the only newspaper in America with enough fidelity to the truth to publish it?

An understanding of the failure of Americans to appreciate the importance of those treaties may be obtained by comparing the attitude of the little New York Evening Post, with that of its great contemporary, the New York Times, which is chosen only because its Index to the

REAL ACHIEVEMENT OF A REAL NEWSPAPER

(An editorial reprinted from the Brooklyn Standard-Union, of February 1, 1923)

The most comprehensive information about the daily newspapers of the United States, Canada, Great Britain and Ireland ever compiled at one time is contained in the INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK edition of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER, issued under date of Jan. 27, 1923.

The EDITOR & PUBLISHER again proves its leadership in the newspaper profession with this truly wonderful encyclopedia of information. Every fact of consequence about all the daily newspapers in the above countries is set forth in detail with the exception of one item. No attempt is made to designate the newspapers which are making money and those which are not. With this exception, nothing is left to the imagination.

James Wright Brown, the owner and publisher of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER, is to be congratulated upon a distinct achievement, one far-reaching in its benefits to every daily newspaper in the United States and to every advertiser, wherever he may be.

News and complete files make it most accessible of all newspapers to the author.

On November 25, 1917, the New York Times put a conspicuous head upon a dispatch from Russia telling of the publication of the first series of secret treaties. The story "played up" some irrelevant material about Ambassador Francis, then proceeded to describe the Franco-Russian agreement on German boundaries.

It quoted the elegram from Izvolsky of March 11, 1917, "stating that France recognizes Russia's freedom to define her western boundaries. This was followed by a telegram from Sergius Sazonoff, former minister of foreign affairs, assuring M. Izvolsky that the agreement with France and England in regard to the Constantinople straits need not be reexamined, and stating the willingness of Russia to give France and England the freedom of defining the western boundaries of Germany, in exchange for the freedom allowing Russia to define the eastern boundary of Germany."

That was the extent of the information given to the readers of the New York Times, and that was far and away more than the readers of the average American newspaper learned, of the secret treaty which established the basis for the present doom of Europe and the destruction of American war ideals.

The following features of the secret treaty were omitted from the New York Times story, although they were contained in the document as published in Russia:

1. The agreement aimed "to attain the political separation of Germany from her trans-Rhenish districts and their organization on a separate basis."

2. The river Rhine was to "form a permanent strategical frontier against a Germanic invasion."

3. The territories on the left bank of the Rhine were "to be constituted an autonomous and neutral state."

4. They were to be "occupied by French troops until such time as the enemy states have completely satisfied all the conditions and guarantees indicated in the treaty of peace."

5. Germany's western frontier was to be fixed "at the discretion of the French Government"—not, as the Times story said, by "France and England."

Take not that this agreement, which exactly sets forth the aims of France at the Peace Conference and the policies of the Poincaré government today, was entered into two months after the Allies had united in a statement of war aims which pledged them to the principle of self-determination.

As published by the American newspapers, this secret paper could be read in the light of the Allied war aims statements, and it would seem to be limited in application to Alsace-Lorraine. But the suppressed provisions proved it a document to fasten on Europe the methods and fruits of militarism.

Would the United States have been lulled by generalizations if the truth had been put before the American people, and discussed on its merits by the leaders of American journalism?

On December 1 and 2, 1917, the terms on which Italy entered the war were cabled to this country from Russia. The New York Times' reception may again be considered typical of the attitude of American newspapers, or fairer than the average. It gave the Italian treaty a first page "follow" head, after a main head reading, "Assure the Allies Russia Will Oust Usurping Reds." The provisions of the treaty were stated briefly, but accurately and completely. This was followed by a dispatch from Washington, beginning: "Officials here were emphatic today in expressing doubt that the provisions of the alleged treaty with Italy contained guarantees of 'delivery' of territories described in the document. . . .

"The State Department, it was asserted, had no knowledge of such an agreement between the Allies and Italy. It was suggested in an unofficial quarter that the so-called treaty might have been forged by the Bolsheviki."

That was virtually the beginning and the end of the news treatment of the secret treaties before they became the overshadowing issue at the Peace Conference. Of editorial treatment there was nothing, although the silence of European governments proved the documents to be genuine. Possibly there was a newspaper, somewhere in America, that faced the issue they presented. If so, it should be recorded.

Yet it was not wholly impossible to appraise the treaties for what they were. Some individuals in America did so, when they had an opportunity. For instance, Prof. Morris Zastrow, Jr., of Philadelphia, wrote in the February 7, 1918, issue of the Nation, that the publication of these treaties in the New York Evening Post "reveals a startling condition of affairs in European chancelleries which must be faced frankly if at the conclusion of this war there is to be a settlement that will insure the world against such another outbreak as has now for three and one-half years plunged the world in deep sorrow and terrible suffering."

Truer words were never spoken during the war. But the condition of affairs was not faced frankly, because the newspapers of America suppressed the facts.

It is easy to frame a defense—"All thoughts were concentrated on the winning of the war." But that is not true. Activities were so concentrated; thoughts were upon the terms of peace. In December, 1917, President Wilson had addressed Congress on the war aims of America. The Allies followed on January 10, 1918, with a restatement of their war aims. Then came the "fourteen points" speech of Mr. Wilson. The entire country, and all of Europe, were discussing the principles of peace, the rights of nations, the formation of a league, the abolition of secret diplomacy. And all the while, due to the refusal of our newspapers to publish the hard and disillusioning truth as contained in formal treaties and written agreements, the principles we believed in were being undermined by the very secret diplomacy we wanted to abolish.

What would have happened if the newspapers had dealt with the secret treaties on the basis of their importance? A dangerous situation would have been created. In order to keep America fervently and effectively in the war, it would have become necessary for every signatory to those secret treaties formally to disavow their provisions. And that was exactly what was needed, both to win the peace and to make the war easier to win.

The purification of the war would have brought liberty-loving people together in an unprecedented unity of purpose. As it was, the secret treaties were exploited to the full in the Central Empires. The Italian Treaty and the Rumanian Treaty went far to restore the unity of Austria-Hungary. They turned countless Slavs into supporters of the Hapsburgs. The treaties stiffened German resistance.

It is reasonable to believe that Austria would have gone to pieces earlier, German morale would have collapsed, the war would have been won more quickly, and the lives of thousands of American soldiers would have been saved if American public opinion had dealt with the facts of the secret treaties and knocked them out—as knocked out they would have been.

The Versailles Treaty never could have been written as it was, if the Franco-Russian agreement had been analyzed in advance. By that agreement of 1917, the French ambition to make the Rhine "a permanent strategical frontier" was covered by a clause providing that the German territories on its left bank were "to be occupied by French troops until such time as the enemy states have completely satisfied all the conditions and guarantees indicated in the treaty of peace."

This provision for the military occupation of the trans-Rhenish provinces was incorporated into the Treaty of Versailles, with no thought on the part of the American public that it was aimed at the dismemberment of Germany. Yet the present French policy, based on that provision of the treaty, is the policy of making the Rhine "a permanent strategical frontier." Looking back at the statement dated March 11, 1917, it seems that a provision for military occupation until the enemy states have satisfied the conditions and guarantees of the peace treaty is enough to insure the permanence of the military frontier on the Rhine.

In other words, provide for military occupation until all of the peace terms are satisfied, make some of the terms impossible to carry out, and military occupation will furnish "a permanent strategical frontier."

The United States is paying the penalty in mortification, and the world in suffering and danger, for the ignorance in which the American people were kept during the war. The newspapers were both the cause and the victims of our national psychology, which demanded that all minds conform to an official standard. Officialdom is merely running true to its standards when it tries to suppress facts, but newspapers are false to their life principle when they join the conspiracy.

Throughout the war, the newspapers of America were agents of propaganda. They were moved by high purposes; they felt themselves consecrated to a patriotic endeavor. But propaganda in the name of patriotism differs from other propaganda not a particle, when measured by the results ensuing from the suppression of the truth.

The penalty for suppressing the secret treaties was the Peace of Versailles, and the penalty for the Peace of Versailles is all about us.

WON'T MEET AT ASHEVILLE

S. N. P. A. Directors Ask Members to Select Other Convention City

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Jan. 30.—The board of directors of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, meeting here yesterday, agreed that the 1923 convention will not be held at Asheville, N. C., which has been the meeting place for the past eight years. They think it will be better to give other cities a chance to entertain. Invitations have been received from Asheville, Chattanooga, Lexington, French Lick Springs and White Sulphur Springs. Questionnaires will be sent to all members so each may express his preference.

Those present at the meeting were Charles I. Stewart, president; A. G. Newmyer, chairman of the board of directors; Mrs. W. W. Barksdale, Clark Howell, Jr., Roy Watson, T. M. Hederman, Maj. Allen Potts and Walter Johnson, secretary.

A part of the meeting was devoted to discussing cost-finding, especially as it relates to national advertising. The program committee for the 1923 convention was instructed to prepare a constructive program to be confined strictly to business with no outside speakers. The report of the committee on labor, made by Chairman G. J. Palmer, said all S. N. P. A. members have made satisfactory contracts with the unions.

AUSTIN, Texas, Jan. 29.—A bill to require Texas newspapers owning less than $10,000 in physical property to furnish a $10,000 bond for protection of judgments secured by persons in actions for libel has been introduced in the Texas Legislature by Representative Jacks, of Dallas, and is signed by several other members of the lower house.

An amendment will be offered by the author of the bill when it is considered in committee, to prevent its touching country or small-town newspapers, the amendment to provide that the regulation shall only apply to papers established in cities of 20,000 or more population.

Co-operative Plan Considered by vertising Managers' Association— Buying Power of Entire City Has Been Surveyed

The first co-operative movement on part of newspaper advertising salesme sell New York to the national advert was discussed in detail at a dinner J ary 26 by the Advertising Managers' sociation of New York City at the vertising Club. A survey of New Y and its environs as a market for nati advertisers prepared with zoning map the Research Bureau of New York U versity was explained.

Plans were laid to solicit the nati advertiser, not as now, on a strictly c petitive basis, but by presenting, co-op tively, detailed facts about New York vast purchasing power; its concentra of population; its tremendous consu tion of staple commodities and luxu and its complex and cosmopolitan divi into communities with different bu habits.

Leo E. "The New York market," said McGivena, "has been much maligned a hard market by advertisers who h tried it and failed; but the New Y market in general is not more diffi than any new market. It has some pe liar difficulties and some marked adv tages. The most difficult aspect of i its size. The failure of many atten to enter the market is traced to one —that the extent and scope and huge of the job are not considered and reali beforehand, and the effort made is tot inadequate to the situation."

The difficulties, Mr. McGivena plained, could be greatly overcome by operation among the salesmen of various newspapers. This phase of plan is now being worked out by the vertising Managers' Association.

IO FUNDS FOR JOINT POSTAL BOARD, HOUSE INSTRUCTS CONFERENCE

enate Appropriation of $75,000 Turned Down When Light Is Flashed on Two-Year Idleness and Expense of the Joint Committee—Post Office to Continue Investigation

By SAM BELL

(Washington Correspondent of EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The Joint Postal Commission, created in 1920 for the avowed purpose of investigating the ha..dling and transportation of mail, will go out of existence at the end of the present fiscal year, if the House dominates in its present attitude of declining to concur in a Senate amendment to the Post Office Appropriation bill providing an additional $75,000 for the Commission. The action in the House in refusing further funds to the Commission has the entire approval of the publishing interests which have fought the dilatory tactics of the Commission and its premise of investigating the cost of handling second-class mail. Congressional action on the proposal to eliminate the war-time increases on second class mail matter has been delayed from time to time on the pretext that members should await the outcome of Joint Commission's investigation.

The action of the House by a vote of 172 to 90 in insisting that no more funds be appropriated for the commission was taken January 25, when House conferees on the Post Office bill were instructed to refuse to accept the Senate appropriation. Both the Senate and House agreed upon the proposal that an additional $500,000 be allotted the Post Office Department for extra clerk hire necessary to take the mail weighing investigation. Influential House members, however, including Rep. Madden, of Illinois, chairman of Appropriations Committee, expressed the opinion that Joint Commission was making little effort to complete its investigation and a further appropriation meant wasteful expenditures of public funds.

"If you appropriate the money," said Rep. Rouse of Kentucky, himself a member of the Joint Commission by virtue of his membership of the House Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, "you will spend about $75,000 on junketing trips for employees and avail nothing. The Commission ought not to have been born; as it is it should be killed at the earliest possible moment."

Several Congressmen, including Rep. Steenerson of Minnesota, a member of the Joint Postal Commission, who had consistently opposed consideration of the publishers' request for reductions in second-class rates, asserted that abolition of the Commission would end the government's investigation of second class mail cost. Rep. Madden in reply pointed out that the Post Office Appropriation Bill carried $500,000 for continuation of the work by the Post Office Department, the only organization of the government really competent to make the investigation.

Mr. Steenerson then resumed his attack on the publishers.

"The periodical publications," he said, which have been enjoying a bonus or a subsidy from the government for years and years first said they wanted to have this investigation made, but as soon as the Commission recommended it they turned around and they and their organs attacked the Commission from one end of the country to the other. We are being abused by the representatives of big journals that are reaping a benefit and a bonus at the expense of the postal service because we are trying to find out what the truth is about the different classes of mail."

Mr. Steenerson's position was supported by Rep. Paige of Massachusetts, who inveighed against what he termed the "propaganda" against the commission.

"For years," he said, "it has been a disputed question whether the government was losing $60.000.000 or $70,000,000 in carrying second-class matter. The Postal Commission has been investigating that question. The second-class publishers claim there is no loss. The Postal Commission is endeavoring to find out whether there is a loss or not. There has never been such a propaganda put up against anything as there has been on this proposition about second-class mail.

"More than $200,000 already has been expended by the commission and to stop it now would be to waste all that has been spent in the past. It is simply a question of whether the government wants to have this investigation made as to the cost of second-class mail. If the publishers of second-class matter believe what they claim, that they want to know the actual cost, they would not put any hindrance in the way of the ascertainment of that fact, but I know they are trying to hinder it by protesting against this $75,000 proposition."

In summing up the position of the vast majority of the House that wanted the commission abolished, Rep. Madden said:

"If the House believes the statement of these gentlemen literally, the House will be deceived. These gentlemen try to make you understand that no provision is being made in this bill for the ascertainment of the cost of handling the mail, and they further try to make you understand that the Joint Commission which we are seeking to abolish is going to make that ascertainment. The Joint Commission is not going to make that ascertainment and the ascertainment is going to be made. Who is going to make it? Why the Postmaster-General; and we have provided $500,000 in this bill to enable him to do it.

"I do not know anything about what the publishers want. But whether they want it or not, it is going to be made."

AUTO MAKERS RELYING ON NEWSPAPERS

Realize Rising Costs Can Be Offset Only by Keeping Plants Going 100%—Chicago Show Advertising Threatens Records

By JAMES T. SULLIVAN

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

CHICAGO, Feb. 1.—That the deluge of advertising, which started with the New York Motor Show is going to continue for some time, is indicated by the fact that in the three days here of the Chicago show or perhaps four days, there have been 314,481 lines of motor car advertising used in five Chicago papers. When it is considered that this has just been for cars, and that accessory advertising made the figures roll up to some 325,000, at least, it is going some.

Another comparison shows that in 1922, in New York last month, with 13 papers getting advertising during motor show week the figures for all combined totalled some 650,000 lines. That covered a period of about eight days. If five Chicago papers in half that time can run up a total of some 50 per cent or thereabouts of the New York total it gives some evidence of what is in sight for 1923.

Here are the lineage figures for the Chicago papers, beginning Saturday and taking in part of today:

Tribune, 95,424.
Herald-Examiner, 71,278.
Evening Post, 60,574.
Daily News, 49,878.
Journal, 32,565.
American, 24,762.

It is very easy to see that the motor manufacturers are contining all along the line, to tell their story to the world by means of the newspapers.

There are two things beginning to worry the manufacturers now. These are production and prices. They are planning a big production again, more than 2,500,000 cars. If they can all keep going at 100 per cent it means overhead can be kept down. That will have a tendency to hold the prices about where they are.

However, while the orders, so far in as a result of the shows held to date, guarantee to keep the factories going full tilt until after the summer, the executives are beginning to wonder if the demand will still keep up. They do not like to admit that they are not quite so optimistic as they were at New York. Not that they have shifted materially to the pessimistic side, but they have been through the changes in the past and now are ready to admit that there may have too much over enthusiasm in the early days of 1923 following the big 1922 sales.

There is a little cloud appearing on the California horizon. The Pacific Coast was one spot where there had been no slump. Just now there are rumors that one is showing up. December made new records, but it may have been an orgy of over-buying. At any rate some of the big men at the Chicago show are slipping away for the West to get first hand information. They are sending subordinates to the Northwest to look over that field and bring it back potentially to make up for any slowing down in California between now and the return of the winter tourists.

So much for production. Everything going into the cars is climbing. Tires are being quoted at higher figures to the motor makers. The rubber market seems to be cornered at London. Lumber is going up. Leather began going up some time ago. Steel advanced with the other things. Now these are all important factors. If they continue to climb, cars may have to go up. The 1923 models were based upon prices quoted last fall, and the makers today are not going ahead with long orders for a supply to cover a year. Therefore they will run out of their materials shortly, and the new orders will cost more. Unless production can be kept high the overhead will mean an impossibility to continue along at present price levels. Yet no one wants to advance. If there is a slowing down of orders some companies may cut prices to be the first to get rid of their stock. It does not take more than a few hundred cars to run a value of stock up to a $1,000,000 or more. That is why they are pouring out their advertising copy to sell the idea of buying to the public.

The creating of a demand for quick sales through newspapers is recognized now as a big factor.

This, then, is the story of the Chicago show, and the reason why papers here are creating new records in the number of columns carried both in show issues and during the week.

And schedules are being made up now for spring campaigns to run into the millions.

There have been some interesting meetings of advertising men here since the show started. The N. A. C. C. Factory Managers' Council got a lot of the advertising men from the car plants together Monday. It was a closed session. President E. S. Jordan, of the Jordan Motor Car Company presided and kept things moving. There were some interesting discussions on all phases of advertising problems, including publicity.

The following day there was a session of the truck advertising men. This was well attended also, and some of the factory men had some good ideas to advance to try to bring the trucks back into their own again.

Wednesday the advertising men identified with the accessory trade held an all day session, at which a program of some very excellent papers were prepared and read under the direction of Chairman Ezra W. Clark.

MATS FOR SMALL PAPERS

Use Urged in Minnesota to Encourage National Advertising

RED LAKE FALLS, Minn., Jan. 28.—Herman Roe, editor of the Northfield (Minn.) News and president of the Country Newspapers, Inc., speaking at the annual convention of the Northern Minnesota Editorial Association held here January 26 and 27, urged publishers to join the co-operative movement for foreign advertising and suggested the installation of a casting box permitting the use of mats, costing the advertiser much less than electros, as a means of securing more business.

The association which adopted a new constitution and by-laws elected the following officers: E. M. Denu, general manager, Bemidji Daily Pioneer, president; Martin Widsten, Warroad Pioneer, vice-president; and Dr. A. G. Rutledge of Minneapolis was re-elected secretary-treasurer for the 18th successive term. J. P. Groth, Roseau Times-Region; Grove Wills, Evelette Clarion, and Carl Carlson, Melrose Beacon, were selected for the executive committee.

The association endorsed the work of the Ten Thousand Lakes Association which spend a large amount of money in advertising the state throughout the United States.

Mr. Denu, the new president, spoke on the problem of giving direct advertisers the same discount as advertising agencies and concluded that under present conditions the advertising agency could not be done away with, and consequently must be protected. C. C. Peterson, a Grand Rapids merchant, said that merchandise is the necessity of the little man and the press and business men should co-operate. Grant Utley, of Cass Lake, advised the publishers to co-operate in advertising their own wares.

PRESSMEN DEMAND A WEEK'S NOTICE OF SHIFT HOURS AND OVERTIME

New York Union Asserts It Will Enforce Ruling of Judge Hand in Election Night Walkout Case—Publishers Offer to Ask Both Manton and Hand for Clarification of Decisions

DEMAND that the New York newspaper publishers give notice in advance of the shifts they will work during the succeeding week, including any proposed overtime, was served this week by David Simons, president of New York Newspaper Web Pressmen's Union No. 25, upon the Publishers' Association. This demand followed several weeks of correspondence upon one phrase in the recent decision of United States Judge Learned Hand, in the case of the walkout of the pressmen on Election Night, that "the newspapers must, under Article II (of the Manton Award) give the men notice during each week of what the shifts will be during the succeeding week, including any proposed overtime, except in cases of sudden emergencies, not then known, of which they shall give notice as soon as they are known." The union in meeting this week instructed President Simons to notify the publishers that "it would abide by Judge Hand's interpretation of the Manton decision." The publishers had not replied on February 2.

Efforts of union officers to institute a compulsory "savings plan" among the members to "meet conditions which will arise on September 1, 1923, when the contract with the publishers expires," met with no success at the meeting. The proposal was left to a referendum of the entire membership.

Following Judge Hand's decision, which appeared in EDITOR & PUBLISHER of December 23, 1922, the union president notified the Publishers' Association of its contention that the newspapers must give notice during each week of what the shifts will be during the succeeding week, with allowance for sudden emergencies, which President Simons defined as "breakdowns or sudden newspaper scoops."

This letter of the union, dated January 6, was answered by the publishers the following week, after several meetings of the Committee of Eight, which has the pressmen's dispute in charge. They "declined to accept the union interpretation, which would be mischievous in its results and which has no basis in Judge Hand's decision." They stated that they intended to continue, in their own interest, as well as that of the union, the reasonable practice of the last 30 years, that the present practices of overtime and notice to shifts have been in common use in every newspaper office in New York for over 25 years and are recognized throughout the United States and elsewhere. It was added that neither the pressmen nor the publisher could not and cannot now tell when and how much overtime will be necessary on any given date in the future, and that he had never been asked to do so by the pressmen or any other of the 16 unions with which he had contractual relations.

The union's reply to this on January 16 disagreed with the publishers and requested that the joint standing committee of publishers and union consider the matter and refer it back to Judge Hand as to just what his decision meant.

In the publishers' reply, on January 22, it was pointed out that the only question submitted to Judge Hand for decision was whether the Evening World pressmen violated the working contract when they refused to work after 7 p. m. on Election Night, and that Judge Hand's decision as to that violation had been clear and unequivocal upon the sole question submitted to him. It was stated that there were ambiguities in Judge Hand's expressions about reasonable notice of overtime, a question raised by the union at the hearing and which had to be left unanswered by the publishers because the union objected to submission of further briefs. There were also ambiguities, it was stated, in the earlier decision of Judge Manton, on several disputed points.

The union, the publishers declared, had refused to join the publishers in a request to Judge Manton to interpret these issues, which both sides had agreed to arbitrate, and the publishers saw no reason, in the circumstances, to return to Judge Hand for a further decision on issues which the publishers did not submit to him. The publishers, however, expressed their willingness to join the union in a request to both original arbitrators to interpret respectively their views more clearly on the disputed points.

The union's latest statement, after its meeting, asserted that it would abide by Judge Hand's decision as to the interpretation of Article II of the Manton award. It reiterated that the union was willing to go before Judge Hand again and have him state in plainer language to the satisfaction of the publishers what his decision meant. The union insisted that the continuous refusal of the publishers' committee to carry out the decision of Judge Hand, sitting as the fifth member of the joint standing committee, was a positive violation of the Manton award and that the union will treat it as such, and that one week from January 29, the decision of Judge Hand will be put into effect by the union. President Simons declared that the union intended to carry out the Manton award, which has only a few months to run and that it would expect the publishers to do the same.

No reply to this communication had been made by the Publishers' Association when EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press.

Article II of the Manton award, rendered last February, provides for working hours as follows:

"Eight consecutive hours, exclusive of the luncheon period hereinafter provided for, considered between the hours of 7 a. m. and 7 p. m., shall constitute a regular day's work. Any eight consecutive hours, exclusive of the luncheon period provided for, between 7 p. m. and 7 a. m., except on Saturday, when the hours shall be in eight consecutive hours between 5 p. m. and 5 a. m., shall constitute a regular night's work. Workmen called for duty between 5 a. m. and 7 a. m. for day work shall receive $1 extra. Reasonable notice shall be given by the publisher to the workmen for the hours it is desired that they labor. Men working on Saturday and Saturday night on Brooklyn papers shall receive the regular Saturday night scale for Saturday night and a bonus of $1.50, provided at least four hours elapse between the two shifts."

In Judge Manton's comments upon this article, at the time, no reference was made to the provision for reasonable notice of shifts.

When the walkout of the Evening World pressmen at 7 p. m. Election Night was referred to Judge Hand for arbitration, he discussed at length the mutual responsibilities of employer and employe. He found that the Evening World pressmen had violated their contract by refusing to work overtime beyond the hour of 7 p. m. set by Judge Manton as the end of the day shift. As a part of his discussion, he stated: "I find further that the newspapers must, under Article II, give the men notice during each week of what the shifts will be during the succeeding week, including any proposed overtime, except in cases of sudden emergencies, not then known, of which they shall give notice as soon as they are known. I do not find that the award requires the newspapers not to change the hours of a shift from week to week."

VOTE AGAINST SUNDAY WORK

A referendum of newspaper men has been taken in Belgium on a proposed law forbidding all work on the preparation of newspapers from Sunday morning until Monday morning. It resulted in a strong vote in favor of the proposed law.

PAPER MEN SEE NEED OF RESEARCH

Canadian Manufacturers Plan to Appoint Director and Establish Plant Next Year—Look for New Outlets for Product

MONTREAL, Que., Jan. 27.—The matters of appointing a director of scientific and industrial research and the establishment of a research plant at a cost of $30,000 were outstanding among the matters discussed at the annual meeting of the Canadian Pulp & Paper Association which closed here yesterday. The importance of research work was generally admitted, but the general feeling was that it was premature to launch the association into so heavy an expenditure. Consequently it was decided to drop the question and to continue the committee studying the matter for another year.

Another matter discussed at length was that of Australian trade, a complaint being raised that Australia was discriminating against Canadian paper in favor of the British product.

The election of officers resulted in the choice of H. F. E. Kent as president, and George Carruthers, vice-president, Edward Beck remaining secretary.

Mr. Beck, reading the president's report in the absence of George McKee who retired from office about a month ago, reviewed the great progress made by the pulp and paper industry during the ten years that the association has been in existence. Newsprint and paper production had increased from 350,000 to 1,090,000 tons per year, about 60 per cent of it produced in Quebec province. The immediate outlook of the industry favored optimism but there was danger particularly in newsprint, of overrunning the permanent demand of the market.

George Chahoon, Jr., president of the Laurentine Company and chairman of Newsprint Section, presented the report of that section, which read, in part, as follows:

"There has been throughout the year a gradual improvement in business generally, and the improvement has been reflected in a greater demand for the product of our mills. The return to more normal conditions has gone further in the United States than in Canada and as that country consumes over 80 per cent of our production of newsprint paper, our mills have benefited accordingly.

"While we still had competition from European countries, that competition was not so great or so keen as in the previous years. The rising exchanges together with an increased demand for newsprint from other countries resulted in smaller quantities of European paper coming into our market and the increased demand for Canadian paper has enabled our mills to run very nearly to capacity throughout the year. Our production this year will be close to 2,100,000 tons or nearly 25 per cent above the production in 1920, the previous record year.

"Of our total exports in 1923, 887,835 tons went to the United States, 33,693 to Australia, 12,029 to New Zealand and the rest mainly to Great Britain and South America.

"The production capacity of Canadian mills was increased during the year by the addition of four new machines, bringing the total daily capacity up to 3,825 tons. For the coming year there are new machines under construction which will increase this daily capacity for 1923 by 490 tons, giving a total capacity per year of about 1,294,500 tons. There will also be other extensions which will not come into operation in the near future, but which will ultimately have to be reckoned with in estimating the future of the industry."

Means of conserving the forest wealth of the Dominion were the main matters discussed by the forestry association, which recommended a special forestry police force. Reduced freight rates on lumber were the main point of argument at the lumbermen's convention.

THEY ARE ALL IN THE DAY'S NEWS

Well, if it works on this crowd he's good. Emile Coué, French exponent of autosuggestion, made himself right at home up at the National Press Club during his visit to Washington. He warned Washington newspaper men that his famous sentence should not be allowed to become an obsession.

Nothing harassed-looking about this crowd. They call it "fair Mexico." In the group above we have, left to right, F. John Wright, New York Herald; Alfred G. B. Hart, London Times; C. B. Travis, International News Service; Frederick G. Neumeier, United Press. All are located at Mexico City.

Off on a European honeymoon. Herbert F. Gunnison, publisher of the Brooklyn Eagle, and his bride (right), who before her marriage was Mrs. F. E. Munroe Baldwin, sailed recently on the Volendam.

$500 reward! William P. Green (left), director of the work of the National Vigilance Committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, while apparently delirious disappeared January 22. A nation-wide search is now being made for him and the A. A. C. W. has offered $500 for information that will lead to his whereabouts. He had been doing vigilance work for six years and is well known as a public speaker. Age 34 years; weight 125 pounds; dark hair, somewhat thin; gray eyes, had many fillings in teeth.

Olin W. Kennedy has other duties than just managing editor of the Miami Herald. In the winter time he entertains the newspaper men who journey down that way. In the group below we have, David S. Tarbell, for many years editor of Scripps-McRae newspapers in Ohio; Ed. W. Howe, Sage of Potato Hill, and Mr. Kennedy, host at a recent outing.

The call of Palm Beach is annually answered. William J. Conners, owner of the Buffalo Courier and Enquirer and Mrs. W. J. Conners, Jr., wife of the publisher of those newspapers (below), are among the regular visitors making merry at that resort this season.

GRAPHIC OILDAG ADS TURNED TRICK FOR CHICAGO DISTRIBUTOR

Intensive Newspaper Campaign of Eight Weeks Quadrupled Number of Sellers of High Priced Lubricants—Copy Shows Teeth in Polished Metal of Automobiles

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

THE man who makes a success as an advertising man has to have some of the same qualities peculiar to an editor. He has to know what will interest people and how they may be made to think his way most readily.

If a big idea can be found in a product and presented dramatically, yet convincingly, a big step has been taken in the problem of causing the public and dealers to sit up and take notice. It goes a long ways in overcoming sales obstacles.

The use of a big, graphic idea has had much to do with the increase in sales in the Chicago market of what is claimed to be the highest price motor oil there. There are numerous motor oils offered for sale, many being strongly advertised, and the outlook for a new oil, especially where high in price, does not encourage, off hand, the thought of any material sale in any large city market.

The Acheson Oildag Company of Niagara Falls, N. Y., manufactures Oildag, the motor oil in question, and Gredag for cups and gears. These products are for motor and factory use. Its Chicago distributor, Hunt, Wallis & Co., last year wished to increase the volume of business being done. Several methods had been tried, but they had not worked out well.

It was decided to conduct an intensive effort of eight weeks directly centered on the city itself. What could be said about the highest price oil to make the motorist willing to pay the price and want the product?

Careful study by the David C. Thomas Company Advertising Agency resulted in a decision to show, enlarged as under the microscope, the highly polished surfaces of pistons, bearings and crankshafts. When thus enlarged, the surfaces showed sharp, uneven teeth. The teeth idea was used to put teeth into the copy.

The teeth diagrams were featured in each advertisement. How the dag of oildag covers the teeth of metal and surrounds them with a film was shown, illustrating the key idea of the copy.

The copy itself might have had its headlines written by a Sunday feature editor and its copy prepared by a special writer of Sunday stories, so skillfully was the treatment handled. The copy was concrete and it hit close home to various points of interest of the average motorist in his car.

One advertisement said:

"HOW MUCH IS YOUR CAR WORTH TODAY?

"Your first ride costs from $100 up. What the others cost depends a good deal on taking the teeth out of your motor.

"When you buy a new car for $900 and drive it a few blocks to an insurance office you will find its value has gone down to $750. It has become a used car; a purchaser wouldn't pay more than that because he can't tell what has happened to the motor and its bearings in that time.

"Whether he knows much about the teeth in metal or not, he does know that there is such a thing as wear and that oil protects only partially against it. What your car will be worth one or more years later will depend a great deal on how well you guard against wear.

"No matter how smooth the cylinder walls and piston rings of your motor may be, they have teeth like those shown in the illustration. An oil-film can cover them, but whenever the motor works hard enough the best oil-film breaks. That is why your motor heats on hills or when driven improperly or hard. Heat means wear, means that the teeth of the metal are chewing.

"By using oildag instead of oil, the teeth of all the bearings surfaces are sheathed with a film of graphite, a fine slippery film. This film is only five-millionths of an inch thick where it covers the teeth—much thinner than ordinary oil film. But it is thousands of times stronger—so strong that after it has been formed you can drive your car as much as an hour without 'heating' the motor.

"The oil of oildag is pure, straight run oil—nothing else. The dag is Deflocculated Acheson Graphite invented by Dr. Acheson, the world famous inventor of carborundum and made electrically in his laboratories at Niagara Falls.

"Dag constitutes only one-fourth of one per cent of oildag—but that is enough to make a crank case full of oildag last from 1,000 to 1,200 miles. A filling of exceptionally good oil generally lasts only 500 miles. This makes oildag much cheaper than oil—even though it costs a few cents more per quart..

"Send for 'Why'—or Call Calumet 0999. Send for names and addresses of the 100 and more garages and filling stations in Chicago who supply oildag on demand. Ask also for our free booklet, 'Why'—or just call Calumet 0999 and ask us."

The name, Oildag, was featured in huge type, with below it the slogan, "Muzzles the teeth of your motor."

Under the headline, "Why today's gasoline makes repair bills run high" and the sub-head, "How a dag film, only five-millionths of an inch thick, keeps bearing surfaces from biting each other," another advertisement stated:

"The gasoline of today is seldom vaporized completely in your motor. It is too heavy. More or less of it runs down the cylinder walls and into the crank case, cutting the oil-film much as kerosene does.

"When the oil film is cut, the teeth of the motor—shown in the illustration—start to chew. All you notice is that your motor 'heats up' quickly. But that heating means friction, friction means wear, and wear means repair bills sooner or later. Oildag prevents this kind of wear because it provides a lubricating film that gasoline can't cut."

The advertisement then described the product and how it works.

"What makes you car grow old so fast?" "How to muzzle the teeth of your motor" and "What makes your motor heat on hills?" were among other pieces of copy used.

Under the main head, "Every motor has teeth that chew up metal," and the sub-head, "When the oil muzzle slips off, they bite—sheathing them properly with Dag protects the bearing surfaces, increases power, decreases repairs and oil costs," a piece of copy in large space pointed out:

"If metal surfaces, however polished and smooth, didn't have teeth, your motor would never wear down or out. If oil-films could really be depended on to keep the teeth muzzled at all times, there would never be any wear, either. But everyone knows that cylinders, piston rings and bearings wear down and out. Even the toughest oil-films break frequently.

"The teeth in your motor can always break through the oil-film when the motor works hard enough. Every one knows how motors heat on hills when driven improperly or hard. Heat means friction; friction means the oil-film has broken and the teeth are chewing at each other—and that means that a bill for repairs and depreciation is being written.

"In new cars and repaired motors, the teeth show even more often because the pistons and bearings fit more closely even on the level. The Dag film is .000005 of an inch thick. That is why many car dealers and motor rehaulers recommend filling your motor's crank case with oildag instead of with oil.

"Oildag does everything that oil can do and in addition muzzles the teeth of metal as no oil-film can. Oildag actually sheathes the t of bearings surfaces with a non-metal film unctuous film, a film of graphite, thinner of oil and thousands of times stronger.

It is so smooth and strong that after it been formed in a motor, the car can be dr as long as an hour with the crank case solutely dry."

The copy then told of the inven Dr. Acheson, and explained why product lasts much longer than regu oil.

A car, with the name Oildag pair on it in giant letters, was shown in s eral advertisements, with the n "Cars marked like this have been run scores of official tests in Chicago, N York and other cities to show the tou ness and the wonderful lubricating qu ity of the "dag" film. Records of to 20 miles, with the crank case ab lutely dry, are the usual average."

Sub-heads were scattered through text to break it up and make it eas to read.

That the work of the salesmen in go after outlets made progress as the vertising appeared is shown by referen made in various pieces of copy. One vertisement said that the names of a hu dred or more garages and filling stati handling Oildag would be furnished telephone, another in a sub-head sa "Why today's gasoline makes repair bi run high—and why 200 garages n carry a lubricant better than oil," and a other "Send for the names and addres of the hundreds of garages and filli stations in Chicago which supply O dag on demand." The advertising a peared in the Chicago Daily News.

As a matter of fact, the campai proved valuable in its moral effect the dealers as well as influence on t public. Hunt, Wallis & Company, t distributor, states that with the ca paign as a powerful factor the numb of dealers was increased 260% in C cago and immediate suburbs and sales i creased 400%. In fact, some of the e fect of the copy still is being felt though the last insertion appeared l August.

It is planned to conduct another ca paign this year.

Metropolis Broadcasting Again

The Miami (Fla.) Daily Metropolis r sumed broadcasting daily radio progra from its station, WFAW, January 2 with new apparatus with a 2,000-mi radius. The Metropolis station has be out of commission for about six week due to damage to the equipment.

Ad Checkers Move

The Advertising Checking Bureau, In has moved from 448 Fourth avenue, Ne York, to 15 East 26th street.

"Oildag" Copy might have been written by a Sunday feature editor and its text prepared by a special writer of Sunday stories, so skillfully was its treatment handled. The story was concrete and it hit close home to the things that most interest the average motorist.

BUFFALO

The Wonder City of America!

Buffalo has often been called the Wonder City of America. The reason for this descriptive and well earned title is found in Buffalo's fortunate location on Lake Erie, the cheap, abundant and accessible electric power from Niagara Falls and its extraordinary transportation facilities—lake, canal and rail.

Its unexcelled Lake Erie location explains why Buffalo has become one of the world's great ports. The port of Buffalo is third in the United States in tonnage. A tremendous lake commerce and an immense grain trade figure largely in Buffalo's prosperity.

An unlimited supply of low cost Niagara Falls power plays a part in the romance of Buffalo's industrial development. Coal, iron and limestone are so easily assembled at Buffalo that it has become the second city in the United States in the manufacture of iron and steel products.

These advantages of location and industrial opportunity are making Buffalo one of the world's great cities, the population at the present time exceeding a half million.

Added impetus to Buffalo's growth is lately given by Dunlop Tire, General Motors, Bethlehem Steel Corporation and the newly located Buffalo plants who have spent or will spend upwards of $75,000,000 in construction and expansion of their Buffalo Establishments.

This high grade, prosperous and responsive zone can be successfully appealed to and dominated by the sole use of the Buffalo News.

As an example—the six leading department stores of Buffalo, whose copy is a daily test of a newspaper's worth to a local advertiser, place in the News 46% of the total copy placed by them in Buffalo's six daily newspapers.

Church Conference Publicity Man's Charges That Washington Post Refused Advertising and That All Ignored or Played Down News Refuted by Indisputable Evidence

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 1.—Washington editors and newspaper managers were aroused to fighting pitch this week by the intimation of Dr. Charles Scanlon, general secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare, that the influence of the motion picture industry in Washington had brought about the suppression of news. In a statement issued for Dr. Scanlon by Walter I. Clarke, manager of the publicity department of the Presbyterian Church, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, the virtual charge was made that Washington newspapers "possibly with negligible exceptions," not only ignored a recent interdenominational conference on proposed legislation for a federal movie censorship, but "actually suppressed paid advertising in connection with it."

M. addresses by Dr. Ellis P. Oberholtzer, formerly Chairman of Pennsylvania Board of Censors, and Rev. [illegible] Twombly, D. D., of Lancaster, Pa.

This is a facsimile reproduction of the advertisement Rev. Dr. Scanlon charges was suppressed by the Washington Post. Exactly as shown here it was published by the Post on January 18, page 2, first column.

Without exception the Washington newspapers denied Dr. Scanlon's imputation and Arthur D. Marks, business manager of the Washington Post, against whom the Rev. Mr. Scanlon's assertions, as quoted by his publicity man, Mr. Clarke, were directed particularly, produced the advertisement in a copy of the Post of January 18, which Dr. Scanlon said was suppressed. Several other of the Washington newspapers carried advertisements of the conference and news notices as well, but it was apparent that the conference did not attract the newspaper interest or publicity that its projectors had hoped.

The attitude of at least two of the Washington newspapers, the Times and the Herald, was frankly stated by Avery Marks, Jr., managing editor of the Times, who said:

"We wouldn't refuse to print any kind of news, as news. We do not carry propaganda, however, and certainly not this kind of propaganda, for we are against federal control of the movies. An advance notice of the conference did appear in the Times. As for Dr. Scanlon's specific charges, I know nothing."

The failure of the Washington Post to run the advertisement submitted for its issue of January 17, Arthur D. Marks explained, was due to the fact that it was given over the counter to a new man who did not know the organization had an account with the Post and held it up to find out if it would be paid for if accepted. It was ordered run the next day by E. S. Johnston, advertising manager, after he had communicated on the telephone with Dr. William Sheafe Chase of New York, who promoted the conference. The 3-inch advertisement in question was printed in the Post of January 18, page 2, bottom of first column.

Following receipt of Mr. Clarke's version of Dr. Scanlon's charges, EDITOR & PUBLISHER secured copies of the Washington newspapers of the dates in question and requested the managing editors of the Washington newspapers to state their answer to the allegations.

The Times and Herald answer is given above.

The Post, as Arthur D. Marks stated, carried the advertisement on January 18, at the foot of the first column on the second page, first following and next to reading matter. In connection with the advertisement, E. S. Johnston, advertising manager, reported as follows to Mr. Marks:

"This ad was brought into the office on Tuesday night, the 16th, for publication Wednesday, January 17. At that time there was only a new man and a messenger boy, and not knowing that these people had an account with us, held the copy up. Upon learning (the next day) when this was brought to my attention, I immediately called Dr. Chase on the 'phone, and later in the day when we were able to catch him, he gave us the order for the ad to run the next day, January 18, and it was published as instructed."

The Star, concerning which Dr. Scanlon said it carried a "short announcement for which I paid," did print the advertising, as such, and it also printed an advance notice and three-quarters of a column reporting the meeting. The story was played on page 5 and carried a regular top-of-column head. Rudolph Kauffmann, managing editor of the Star, gave EDITOR & PUBLISHER the following statement:

"Dr. Scanlon's charges about Washington papers are absolutely untrue. So far as the Washington Star is concerned, on January 17 an announcement of the conference with a detailed program was published in the Star's news columns. On January 18, the conference was covered by a Star reporter and three-quarters of a column report of the proceedings was published in the news columns. A paid announcement was published in the advertising columns."

Lowell Mellett, editor of the Washington News, was just as emphatic in his repudiation of the press agent's charges. He said:

"The Washington Daily News carried an advance announcement of the Interdenominational Conference and a comprehensive news story of its sessions prominently displayed under the headlines 'Says Magnates Control Hays.' No advertising was offered or refused. Dr. Scanlon's charges are utterly baseless so far as this newspaper is concerned."

Briefly Dr. Scanlon's recital, as told by Mr. Clarke, was as follows:

"Two days preceding the conference, Dr. William Sheafe Chase, who was actively promoting it, called at the offices of a Washington newspaper, and, being unable to secure the publication of any news notice, submitted a paid advertisement simply announcing the time and place of the conference and the agencies by which it was called.

"The advertisement did not appear as agreed upon and in company with him I called the following day to make inquiry.

"One of the assistants in the advertising department told us the advertising manager had instructed him not to admit the advertisement. Inquiring why, he said that the manager simply stated it would 'hurt the paper.'

"Dr. Chase and I then went to the business manager of the paper. He insisted that we were mistaken and accompanied us to the advertising department where the young man confirmed, in our presence, what he previously had told us. The manager then said he would then take it up with the advertising manager. That evening some one called Dr. Chase on the 'phone, claiming to represent the paper, and said they had reconsidered and that the advertisement would appear the following morning—that is, on the day of the conference—but it did not appear."

The newspaper referred to, Mr. Clarke informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER, was the Washington Post. Arthur D. Marks, its business manager, said flatly today that he had never received a visit from Dr. Scanlon and Dr. Chase and knew nothing of the incident until it was called to his attention by Mr. Clarke's publicity notice. He offered the explanation made above and gave the correspondent of EDITOR & PUBLISHER a copy of the Post of January 18 containing the Conference advertisement which Dr. Scanlon said did not appear.

Dr. Scanlon acknowledged that a "small" notice did appear in another newspaper, also "a short announcement for which I paid in the Washington Star." Dr. Scanlon said:

"As chairman of the conference, I publicly stated just what had occurred and assured the gathering that we would be heard in every part of the country, notwithstanding the conspiracy of silence imposed upon the public press by the motion picture interests.

"The 'freedom of the press,' of which we have heard so much, is a farce, a delusion and a snare, when any business for sinister motives can prevent announcement of public welfare endeavor such as this. The liquor traffic in its worst days never exceeded, if in equalled, such methods.

Detroits Retail Business Increases Show Prosperity

The Retail Dealers' Association in Detroit, reporting on the volume of business transacted in December, 1922, as compared with December, 1921, showed an average increase of 31.11 per cent in all lines of retail trade for this city.

This is the ninth consecutive month that retail sales in Detroit have shown an increase over the corresponding month of the preceding year.

In Detroit the retail stores spend from 60 to 80 per cent of their total advertising appropriations with The Detroit News, this being a most important factor in maintaining the wonderful position of The Detroit News among the newspapers of America.

Increased business is the rule in Detroit, where there is no unemployment and where the factories are working night and day.

Take advantage of this situation through The Detroit News which reaches practically every home in Detroit and vicinity.

The Only Authorized Service of News and Pictures Of the Tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen

(King of Egypt 3,000 Years Ago)

From The London Times, January 10, 1923

THE TOMB OF THE KING

CONTRACT GIVEN TO "THE TIMES"

EXCLUSIVE SERVICE OF NEWS

LORD CARNARVON'S PLANS

We are able to announce that Lord Carnarvon, with the cordial concurrence of Mr. Howard Carter, has entered into an exclusive agreement with The Times for the distribution throughout the Press of the world of all news and photographs of his discoveries in the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen. Both Lord Carnarvan, since his return to London, and Mr. Howard Carter, at Luxor, have found it an impossible task to supply the Press individually with news and illustrations of their discoveries. Accordingly they have agreed for the future to employ a single agency for this purpose.

The Times was enabled, by the courtesy of Lord Carnarvon, to publish the first account of the discoveries in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings, which have aroused a world-wide interest never before approached in the annals of excavation in Egypt or in any other land. Lord Carnarvon has now accepted the offer of The Times to place its organization at his disposal for the purpose of supplying a service of news and illustrations of the discoveries to every newspaper, magazine, or other periodical publication in the world which wishes to have it. He has therefore placed in our hands the whole of the serial publication rights of his expedition, and these rights include all news of discoveries, special articles, interviews, and photographs relating to the several chambers of the tomb of King Tut-ankh-Amen, opened and yet to be opened. Neither Lord Carnarvon nor any member of his party will supply news, articles, or photographs to any other individual, newspaper, or agency. No other service will be authorized.

The Times will supply the Press of the world with the material obtained under this agreement by means similar to those used in the arrangement which it made last year with the Mount Everest Expedition. Arrangements have already been made in Egypt and in London by which the whole of the material supplied by Lord Carnarvon and Mr. Howard Carter will be dispatched to The Times Office in London for simultaneous release to the Press of the world. The Times will make its own arrangements for this service direct with other newspapers, not only in this country, but throughout the world. All news matter and photographs published under this agreement will bear the following acknowledgment: "The Times world's copyright by arrangement with the Earl of Carnarvon." Both The Times and Lord Carnarvon will take every precaution to prevent any infringement of this copyright.

Lord Carnarvon will leave London at the end of next week for Luxor. During his absence Mr. Howard Carter has been engaged in removing and preserving the objects found in the first chamber. Soon after Lord Carnarvon's arrival at Luxor the most important task of all will be undertaken. The mystery of the north wall of the outer chamber, guarded by gigantic statues of King Tut-ankh-Amen, will be solved. Nobody can yet say what will be discovered behind that wall, but Lord Carnarvon has made public his conjecture in the special article which he contributed to The Times on December 11. He then said:

"There is little doubt that behind this wall there exists a chamber or chambers, and in one of these probably reposes, in his coffins and sarcophagus, the body of King Tut-ankh-Amen. Should this Royal burial-place prove to be untouched, then the sight to be revealed will prove to be absolutely unique in the experience of any living archaeologist, and, as far as I know, in the history of archaeology."

It is possible that there may be a further chamber or chambers beyond this central one. In any event it is certain that the excavations will by no means be completed at the end of the present season. The work will have to be discontinued some time in April because of the heat. It will be resumed in the middle of October, and will probably be continued through the whole of next winter. It should be emphasized that The Times scheme embraces the work not only of the present season but of such future seasons as may be used for the completion of the exploration of all the chambers of the tomb of King Tut-ankh-Amen.

As it is desirable in the general interest that the scheme should be put into operation without delay, all who are interested in The Times service are asked to communicate immediately with the Manager at Printing House-square.

¶ The discovery of the tomb a few weeks ago aroused world-wide interest. People from all parts of Europe and America are already flocking to the scene. Only the ante-chamber has been opened, but it was found to contain treasures unrivalled in the annals of Archaeology. The inner chambers, containing presumably the mummies of Tut-ankh-Amen and his queen, and probably also many further examples of the art and handicraft of one of the oldest civilizations, are now about to be opened.

¶ It is proposed by the Earl of Carnarvon, under whose concession for exploration the tomb was discovered, to permit henceforward only authorized news, articles, and pictures relating to the discovery.

¶ These will appear at frequent intervals in the daily and Sunday editions of

The New York Times

¶ The pictures will appear chiefly in the Sunday rotogravure sections, where full justice can be done them. The articles will be prepared by competent writers and Egyptologists. Many pictures are on the way to New York and hundreds more will be taken. The service will probably run through several months.

Notice to Editors and Publishers

READERS AND DEALERS SERVED WITH FUEL THROUGH CLASSIFIED COLUMNS

Indianapolis News Has Carried Special Section in Its Want-Ads for Several Years—Satisfactory Method of Comparing Classified Lineage Is Needed

By C. L. PERKINS

Executive Secretary, Association Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers

LACK of vision is undoubtedly one of the greatest handicaps in every line of business. Certainly this is true in the business of selling classified advertising.

The average person whose business is selling and developing want-ads realizes that they are efficient in selling real estate. He will agree that classified advertising offers the best channel of employing help. He will admit that want-ads will do all the things that they have done for many years but he doesn't see or admit the undeveloped possibilities. Want-ads will accomplish successfully many things—many new tasks if given the opportunity.

This is not an indictment against classified managers. They are just like the great majority of human beings—lacking in sufficient imagination to enable them to venture out of the beaten path. Classified managers are undoubtedly even more progressive than people in many other lines yet the scope of classified has not been greatly enlarged in the last ten years.

One of the great questions of the day is coal. Coal famines, coal strikes, federal coal investigations, state coal bureaus, empty coal bins, high coal prices, and claims of coal profiteering are seen daily in the news columns and heard in conversation. Coal is one of the topics of the day and has been for some time on account of its importance in our lives.

Yet coal and want-ads have never been considered together—at least not seriously until H. G. Barringer, classified advertising manager of the Indianapolis News, had a vision. He believed that consumer and dealer would both be benefited if coal and other kinds of fuel were advertised in the want-ad columns of the daily newspaper. Having this idea he started to prove it. A couple of years ago he established this classification on the News and secured a few advertisements which produced some results. Since then he has endeavored to build this classification. Advertisers have been called upon. They have been sent direct by mail campaigns, and at the same time the readers of the News have been educated to buy their fuel through want-ads.

The result is that today the Indianapolis News is printing three and four columns of coal advertising a day. The advertisements range from 2 to 75 lines and all quote prices for the various grades and kinds of coal. As a result the people of Indianapolis know the prices of coal—a greedy dealer cannot charge exhorbitant prices—the reliable dealer can impress upon the public his reliability and create good will. Both dealers and public are benefited by having this new method of marketing developed. That this is true is shown by Mr. Barringer's statement:

"All the dealers of the column are getting wonderful results. The big dealers who up to this time have been holding out on us are gradually being forced in for the reason that they have been losing considerable business to the dealers who have been represented these past two years.

"About the last of December one of the largest dealers in the city started to advertise. He tells us that he did more cash business the first five days of January than during the entire month of December. This is certainly a very good testimonial."

Other newspapers will do well not only to follow the plan of Mr. Barringer in developing a coal column but also in building up new fields of usefulness for the want-ad.

THE following letter from C. A. Sternberger, classified advertising manager of the San Francisco Examiner, presents an interesting subject:

"How can we develop a satisfactory method for comparison of classified lineage?

"Some papers use small headings, others take up as much as an inch of space with line drawings or poster type displays. The gross figures given out by a newspaper, therefore, may not represent the actual lineage. Variance in even the leads used in making up the pages will amount to a considerable difference in a month's time.

"Why not put the classified lineage tabulation on a net line basis? That seems to me to be the most adequate method of reaching an honest comparison between newspapers. We all want to show the greatest lineage possible but we surely want to show it in an honest way.

"Take the San Francisco Examiner, for instance:

"We use 8 point heads and 1 point cut-off rules and we justify our columns without the use of the leads whenever possible. Yet we must stand comparisons with newspapers which employ 2 point cut-off rules, make up their columns loosely and use extra large headings. The tabulation by the gross lineage method, therefore, does not supply a fair basis of comparison.

"I should like to see some expressions from other classified managers and wish that we might work toward a definite standard for classified measurement."

Mr. Sternberger's contention concerning various sizes of headings and cut-off rules is correct. Furthermore, different papers included in their classified figures various kinds of advertising. Most papers when referring to classified mean what are commonly termed want-ads. Many others include in their classified such lines of business as Auctions, Schools and Colleges, Resorts and Travel, etc.

Do your part toward creating a standard system of measurement. Send your ideas on the subject in this column for publication.

ONCE a young business man approached a theater manager and asked permission to talk to the audience. "It will cost you $5.00 to whisper and $25.00 to yell," said the manager. "I'll take five whispers," said the young man, acting on George Ade's moral that—"even the best can't win the medal every time."

There is, in this illustration,, a very significant point for classified salespeople. Followed, it will help them, their newspapers, and their advertisers.

The point is simply this: that three and seven time advertisements are much more effective and productive than those of one insertion, even if the one time copy is larger.

This does not reflect at all on the pulling power of a newspaper or its value as an advertising medium. Salesmen do not expect everyone they visit to give them orders. They visit many to land few. Now consider the large one time advertisement and the same copy, in less space, if need be, run seven times.

Every day a great army of people read the want-ad pages of newspapers to satisfy their wants. But these wants and this army of readers are constantly changing. Today Jones wants a position. Tomorrow he has no immediate want, and the next day he may want an auto mobile. No one can tell when newspap readers will have some specific wa Isn't it then a bit unreasonable to expe that an advertiser can always select o certain day of the three hundred a sixty-five and expect to reach his be prospect on that day?

How much better it is to speak to th ever shifting audience five or seven tim —even if you speak in a whisper—f the whispers are heard and understoo just as plainly as the one-time shouts.

Simply on a theory of getting a bett price when there are two or three pro pective buyers, it is better to advertis an article for several days. Or if th advertiser wants help or something els isn't it better for him to have a choic of four or five applicants or articles, a the case may be, than be limited to one

Just as ham makes restaurant busines better; cloudy days are bad for dentist and cigar sales are affected by the new in the morning newspapers; want ads ar affected by one and a hundred outsid conditions—which neither the salesma nor the advertiser can foresee.

The classified salesman will, therefor find it better for himself, the advertise and the newspaper, to urge the use o five or seven time advertisements instea of one-time flash insertions.

OHIO DAILIES SEE BUMPER BUSINESS IN 1923, WITH RATES GOING UP

Associated Dailies, Select List, and Ohio Scripps-Howard Papers in Joint Session at Columbus, Give Special Emphasis to Community and Farm News

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Feb. 1.—With 200 newspaper men attending, the Ohio Newspaper Convention, comprising joint sessions of associated Ohio dailies, select list of Ohio dailies and Ohio Scripps-Howard papers was successfully held at Columbus, January 29, 30, 31. The tone of the conference was optimistic, with prospects for a financially successful year ahead voiced by delegates. Advertising prospects, as outlined by Harvey R. Young, advertising manager of the Columbus Dispatch, and corroborated by messages from many advertising firms and newspapers, are much better than last year's.

Business is on an upward trend, prices of commercial products will probably rise and a bumper advertising year is predicted. Many Ohio newspapers are increasing advertising rates, and their publishers are confident lineage will not shrink as merchants are realizing the pulling power of advertisements.

Afternoon and evening sessions on January 29 were devoted to the community newspaper. Circulation, country correspondents, farm news and makeup of the community newspaper were the principal topics of discussion. Most speakers felt that circulation of community newspapers could be greatly increased by better selection of correspondents, and by placing them on a paid rather than a subscription basis. Closer contact with correspondents has been secured by arranging dinners periodically for correspondents at which all may gather to discuss new values, news-writing and get in closer touch with the editor. Instruction sheets for correspondents have proved their value, while farm news is of undoubted attraction to rural subscribers. However, farm news must be such as will interest the general public.

The how-to-do-it farm news has a place in farm papers but not in the newspaper, the editors agreed. Large crops and unusual successes should be given special mention, and grange and other agricultural activities should be faithfully reported. The farmer wants to be treated just as any other individual and a special heading for his news is no more necessary than special departments for grocers, blacksmiths, and dry goods merchants, one speaker declared.

A feature of these sessions was a display of 100 Ohio newspapers, with awards for the winning papers in five classes. Prize winning publications follow:

CLASS 1.—Best local farm, home and community news, judged on quality, quantity and manner of presentation. First prize, Millersburg Republican; second, Hillsboro Gazette; third, Westerville Public Opinion; mention, West Union Peoples Defender, Archbold Buckeye, Hillsboro News-Herald, Richland County Leader, Circleville Democrat-Watchman, Madison, County Democrat, Hancock County Herald, Putnam County Vidette.

CLASS 2.—Best front-page make-up judged on typography, balance, display and the suitability and arrangement of material. First prize, West Union People's Defender; second, Archbold Buckeye; third, Medina County Gazette; mention, Hillsboro Gazette, Chagrin Falls Exponent, Madison Press, Ada Herald, Brookville Star, Barnesville Enterprise, New Paris Mirror.

CLASS 3.—Best editorials, to be judged on subject, content and typographical presentation. First prize, Port Clinton Progressive Times; second, Putnam County Vidette; third, Liberty Center Press; mention, Circleville Democrat-Watchman, Morrow County Sentinel, Sycamore Leader, Barnesville Enterprise, Hillsboro Gazette, Washington C. H. Record-Republican.

CLASS 4.—Dailies in towns of less than 25,000, judged on best local, farm, home and community news. First prize, Findlay Morning Republican; second, Sandusky Register; third, Xenia Republican; mention, Coshocton Tribune.

CLASS 5.—Cities above 25,000, to be judged on farm page department, in light of content, make-up and degree of local flavor maintained. First prize, Toledo News-Bee; second, Toledo Daily Blade; third, Sandusky Register (Special).

Judging was done by Prof. Bristow Adams of the New York State College of Agriculture. Prize ribbons will be made up as zinc etchings and will be sent to winners for publication. This display attracted widespread interest throughout the state. Held as an experiment this year, it will be made again next year, as officials feel such competition to be of great value in stimulating better publications.

Tuesday morning was taken up with a business session and an address by George U. Marvin of the Ohio Department of Agriculture on "Marketing Service and the Press," who emphasized possibilities of the press for great service in marketing. F. W. Bush, president of the Associated Ohio Dailies, presided. Carlisle N. Greig of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, declared that newspapers do not advertise their wares sufficiently, in his talk on "Merchandising a Newspaper." Newspapers, he said, are constantly seeking advertisers, preaching to them the gospel of advertising values, but seldom practicing what they preach. Circulation can be built up if the editor lets his readers know in advance what features to expect. He should tell them throughout the week what to expect in the Sunday edition. He should run advertisements for those who patronize the advertising columns, educating them to a fuller appreciation of returns from this source, and teaching them some of the psychology of successful advertising.

Guy E. Newark, Columbus, told delegates newspapers should be well housed. Comfortable quarters will give a paper self-respect and will help to inspire confidence in it from subscribers. A shabbily housed newspaper, reflecting meager returns and lack of prosperity, exerts the same influence as a shabbily dressed tramp giving advice on financial matters. A show of prosperity will gain both circulation and advertising, he said. Plans for a modern newspaper home were presented and talks were made by publishers who have recently gone into new quarters.

"Giving the Readers What They Want" was discussed by Prof. Adams, who showed the fallacy of believing newspapers printed a superabundance of crime news. Actual tests show that four per cent of the reading matter is crime news, and it is only those people who hungrily devour every morsel of this kind of news who feel it is emphasized. Business and finance news constitutes an average of 28 per cent of news space in several metropolitan papers with sports, foreign, educational, government and political, labor, crime, disaster, courts, liquor, society, agriculture and miscellaneous news following in the order named. Prof. Adams thinks a survey of each paper, if made and published, would be of great educational value to subscribers and would help circulation problems.

The evening session began with a banquet at Deshler Hotel, followed by talks from Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press; William B. Colver, directing editor of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, and Smith Bennett, Ohio attorney. Greetings from President Harding were read, expressing his pleasure in being a member of the organization and his regent in not being able to atte

Gov. A. V. Donahey of Ohio also s regrets.

Mr. Bickel, speaking on "Combing World for News," declared the har task is to comb the news for truth. F eign news is more difficult to get, as m countries color their reports with pro ganda, with the result that distor viewpoints are often presented to the p lic. Every effort is made by the gr international services to get the facts these reports. He also stated Ameri newspapers are far in advance of others, due to retardation of other tions by the recent war in Europe. H tax rates in foreign countries handi them greatly, making it more difficult them to come back.

An entertaining account of the gro and death of newspapers was given Mr. Colver—it is given at length in other column—while Mr. Bennett gav general outline of present libel laws. the concluding session Wednesday mo ing, Mr. Young outlined advertis prospects for next year, and a rou table discussion of successful newspa practices was held.

Officers of the Buckeye Press As ciation announced their state meeti would be held March 1 and 2.

Election of officers by the Associat Dailies resulted in choice of the follo ing: President, R. C. Snyder, Norwi Reflector-Herald; first vice-president, E. Cook, Columbus Citizen; second vi president, George Taylor, Portsmou Sun-Times; secretary, Fred Walla Coshocton Tribune and Times-Ag treasurer, Alfred Haswell, Bowli Green Sentinel-Tribune. WED CIRCULATION; WOO ADVERTISING AND GO BROKE ON ALIMONY

So William B. Colver Sees One Phase of a Newspaper, Considered as Folks, in Fitting Its Existence to the Seven Ages Made Famous by William Shakespeare

By WILLIAM B. COLVER*
Editorial Director, Scripps-Howard Newspapers

A NEWSPAPER has come to appeal to me as though it were a personality—a man, a woman, or a child—and I have come to think that I could see in a newspaper those same traits and vices and virtues and strengths and weaknesses that I see every day in the human beings around me. To be highbrow for a moment, let us say that we will address ourselves to a Biological Theory of Newspapers. To be low-brow, let us consider newspapers as folks.

Taking Shakespeare's seven ages of man, let us see if the span of life of a newspaper will not fit fairly into the poet's seven periods in the life of man.

"At first the infant
Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms."

Those of you who have stood by at the first day's publication of a baby newspaper will agree that that is a pretty good description of the first age of a newspaper.

Like the human infant, brought into an uneager world without its consent being asked, it finds itself "mewling and puking in its nurse's arms," its baby brain bewildered and its parents wondering whether it will live long enough to prove that the second summer is the hardest.

Friend Shakespeare describes the second stage in the life of man

"And then the whining school-boy, with his satchel
And his shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school."

So the baby newspaper, if it did survive the second summer, having gotten its little stomach settled and eased off on the mewling stuff, enters upon the boyhood stage. It is going to the School of Experience. It is too big by now to command the pity and sympathy to which it was entitled as an infant, and, like a boy, it takes advantage of this fact and the fact that it is not big enough and old enough to be held accountable for its whining, for its reluctance to go to the School of Experience. I suppose the line, "creeping like snail," means the ingrained reluctance of a newspaper in its earlier age to go to press on time.

These are the childhood years when the newspaper is likely to be noisy and rude and unmannerly. To be, generally, a little rowdy. The exception, of course, is the flaxen-haired, blue-eyed, little angel, dressed all-the-same Lord Fauntleroy and who never, never tells a lie or gets its hands dirty. As between the mollycoddle and the rowdy, give me the rowdy. For he, however unwillingly, is learning in the School of Experience where, if he has red blood enough to be a rowdy, he will be able to survive the polishing process which will prepare him for his next and quite interesting age, when, according to Shakespeare:

"And then the lover,
Sighing like a furnace, with a woful ballad
Made to his mistress' eyebrow."

Here is the newspaper with the down beginning to show on its upper lip and its voice beginning to seek the lower registers—cracking occasionally—turned lover and "sighing like a furnace" as it woos its necessary mate.

There are always two of these gals. One is a coy miss, shy and bashful, but very, very canny. The lover "sighing like a furnace" will make small progress with this girl unless she knows all the time that his intentions are honorable and that he is a he-man. This girl's name is Circulation.

The other girl is a vamp. She is all for the jazz. She will have no dealings with our young lover unless she is perfectly certain that she will get the big end of the bargain. She won't stand by him in adversity. She won't nurse him when he is sick. I am not saying anything against this girl, except—that she is not exactly of a generous disposition. Her name is Advertising Copy—call her Addie for short.

It is at this point in life that many newspapers wreck promising careers by electing to lead Miss Circulation to the altar (thereby thinking they have her tied for life), while their real affections are given to the other girl—Addie. And the more the newspaper gallivants around with his mistress the more certain it is that his jealous wife, Circulation, will effect a separation even if she has to take the road to Reno. And when she does separate—the alimony is something awful.

Well, if the newspaper gets through this rather perilous point in its career, it finds itself happily married to Circulation, who, on her part, fulfills her duty and provides him with a plenteous progeny, while the vamp girl is what we used to call the "hired girl" and now call the "maid." She is out in the kitchen preparing nourishing food for Mamma Circulation and all the little Circulations. Then everything is fine, and our hero, thinking pretty well of himself, passes to Shakespeare's fourth estate, which is described:

"Then a soldier,
Full of strange oaths and bearded like the pard;
Jealous in honour, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth."

And here you have the newspaper in the prime of young manhood, inclined, perhaps, to be sudden and quick in quarrel, though in most cases not his own quarrel, but rather the quarrel of his community and of his own fellow citizens, and jealous of the honor and integrity of his town. This is the period and these are the years that decent living, courage, honesty, temperance, charity and loyalty will prolong, almost indefinitely. And these are the years when the newspaper pays back, or should pay back, to its suffering fellow citizens, for the inconvenience and the bother that it has inflicted upon the community during those years that it has been "mewling and puking" and "whining" and "sighing like a furnace" and being guided, generally, by the selfishness and egotism of extreme youth.

Four of the seven periods are passed. These are the periods of growth and achievement. So the fifth one:

"And then the justice,
In fair round belly with good capon lined,
With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances."

There is your newspaper, no longer militant, no longer fighting on foot, the comrade and equal of his fellow citizens, but with "fair round belly" lined with dividends. Plant all paid for, money in the bank, member of the best clubs, director in the bank; from the height of his own self-esteem judging his humbler fellow citizens with "eyes severe."

"Beard of formal cut"—some of the jazz gone out of the make-up. Getting sobered down now. A bit conservative—eh, what? And "full of wise saws and modern instances." The wise saws being its own particular inspired-from-on-high judgments on its fellow man and on nations, and considerable less emphasis laid on "modern instances," which along back in the second, third and fourth periods of the newspaper's life, were the much-prized, but now vulgar news items.

Well, that can't last. Growth is ended. The decline begins. The wife, Circulation, is either dead or growing extremely feeble and all the little Circulations have married and left home. Addie, no longer a vamp, thin and feeble, only works a few days at a time, and the meals she cooks are not nourishing. Which, of course, brings us to Shakespeare's sixth age, described thus:

"The lean and slipper'd pantaloon,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side;
His youthful hose, well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound."

Lean, hungry, spindle-shanked and too small for his socks—that means the fine, big building and the great plant are too big for the dwindling product. The lusty voice of former days turned to "a childish treble" which commands neither attention nor respect but which, in the nature of a querulous whine, annoys the neighbors and becomes a public nuisance.

And the burden of the old man's plain that "things are not as they used to b

These years are few. For the desc once started is rapid, and, none too s for the comfort of the poor old man for the pleasure of the community, newspaper slips swiftly and unnoti into the seventh stage, which is the "Last scene of all,

That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans ev thing."

One more job for the undertak Eyes too dim to see injustice or oppr sion; no teeth to bite into the probl of the day; no taste wherewith to sa the lust of battle and the joy of victo "Sans everything."

So you see, the newspaper life cycle fairly well with the Shakespearean l of man.

Here you see the paper that remin you of the withered old maid who tak her solace with the office cat. Again see the boob. Soft and credulous. Aga we see the shrew, fault-finding, scoldi Again we see the bully, uncharitab domineering, intolerant. Again we s the snob, arrogating to himself omn cience and superiority over his fellow ci zens. Again we see in turn the graft the hypocrite, the sycophant, the toad We see the miser, the glutton, the seek after flattery and praise or the chron invalid. The neurasthenic filled wi phobias. And, too, we see the newspap which takes its place as a simple, indu trious, patriotic citizen. The kindly, u derstanding neighbor. The one who repaid for his good deeds by the me satisfaction of doing them.

That is enough. These newspapers a all just folks. And just as we love foll in the mass and like or hate them individuals, we like or dislike individu newspapers but love them in the ma and devote our lives to their service. Ar if we choose our masters well, there no more honorable service under the su

IS YOUR NEWSPAPER COMPOSED OR "ASSEMBLED"?

TRADE LINOTYPE MARK

Is your composing room a composing room or an "assembling" room? Are your compositors half compositors and half errand boys? How much walking around, how much going to get something, how much fetching and carrying is there in your "assembling" room? Think of the absurdity of a full-grown man walking 25 feet to get a line of a certain 18-point type and walking 25 feet to bring it back, and of somebody else taking the same journey the next day to put that line of type back in its case.

Multiply this by several times and you have composition as it exists in many plants today. It is not composition at all — it is "assembling."

Straight-line production is as profitable in a newspaper or job plant as in any industrial plant, and the only way to get straight-line production of combination text-and-display matter is on a Text-and-Display Linotype. An operator may sit in his chair and bring down several sizes of different kinds of type just as they are marked on the copy, from small text to full 36 point — in an uninterrupted, continuous, straight-line stream — all in one galley, ready for the make-up man — no walking at all. Every minute is productive time, and there is no distribution tomorrow.

Whether it is a country office or a big city plant there is a Text-and-Display Linotype to meet your needs — Models 21, 22 or 24.

BRITISH ADVERTISING INTERESTS BUSY ON AD CLUBS CONVENTION PLAN

Delegation Will Attend A. A. C. W. Meeting at Atlantic City to Work for Favorable Final Decision—Preliminaries Take Concrete Form

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

LONDON, Jan. 23.

THE suggestion put forward by Sir Charles F. Higham, representing the Thirty Club of London last year at the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World convention, that in 1924 British advertising men would welcome an International Convention to be held in London, has just taken firm root. Up to now advertising men and publishers have been too busily occupied with the activities of the big advertising season to devote time to much more than informal discussion of the idea, but with the slow-up after the year-end there have been shown many signs of active interest in the project, and various bodies are now engaged in dealing with its preliminaries in a concrete form.

It is understood here in London, of course, that definite acceptance of the Thirty Club invitation cannot be looked for until the A. A. C. W. meet in convention later on, but despite this it is intended that every step be taken to make it thoroughly apparent that the proposed convention shall be wholly representative of British interests, and every confidence is expressed, first by John Cheshire, director, Lever Bros. Ltd., who is president of the Thirty Club of London, and also generally that these serious efforts to convince our American friends of an assured welcome will find the right response.

It will be recalled that Sir Charles Higham bore letters of commendation of the scheme for the London convention from the late Viscount Northcliffe, whose support in itself would have ensured its success. It was thought that by his death such support might not easily be found elsewhere, but it is gratifying to know that Sir Charles Higham has received from Viscount Rothermere, now the head of the Daily Mail and associated companies, in which he states that all possible assistance will be rendered by his associates, thus generously providing a significant assurance of much desired co-operation.

Mr. Cheshire, as head of the Trinity Club of London, states that it is the intention of the club to arrange for the attendance of a fully representative delegation at the A. A. C. W. Convention this year at Atlantic City to pull all their weight in influencing the final decision in favor of London.

Meantime, the honorary secretary of the Thirty Club has been getting after the various associations in and allied with advertising interests, with the result that the following organizations have agreed to appoint delegates to a general committee for the consideration and arrangement of the London convention plans:

Newspaper Society: Sir James Owen, Valentine Knapp and Sir George Toulmin.

Newspaper Proprietors' Association: Lt. Col. E. F. Lawson, B. F. Crosfield and Thomas McAra.

Weekly Newspaper Proprietors' Association: George Springfield, C. R. Johnson and S. H. Perrian.

Scottish Daily Newspaper Society: H. Thompson Clark, H. J. Lees and J. W. A. Mudie.

Association of Advertisement Managers of London and Provincial Press: H. C. Patterson, F. Osborne and Shewin Thomas.

Publicity Club of London: Robert Thornberry, Roy Hardy and Andrew Milne.

Federation of Master Process Engravers: A. Dargavel, Alfred Craske and F. H. Vaus.

British Association of Display Men: E. Willins, L. Ferie and W. G. Rowe.

Incorporated Society of British Advertisers: N. F. Kingzett, J. A. Kenningham and H. G. Humphries.

The Association of British Advertising Agents, the Incorporated Society of Advertisement Consultants, the United Billposters' Association and the Federation of Master Printers are also expected to appoint delegates.

Doubtless, part of the reason for this special activity may be attributed to the presence in London of F. A. Wilson-Lawrenson, the chairman of the American On-to-London Committee of the A. A. C. W., who is looking around to find out whether we are really serious about it. Mr. Wilson-Lawrenson has been received with open arms, and his enthusiasm on A. A. C. W. affairs has proved mightily impressive to all who have met him. The big affair at which he talked to advertising men on the subject was the dinner being given by the Thirty Club on January 18, at which Sir Philips Lloyd-Graeme attended as president of the Board of Trade. After that there was probably little doubt left in Mr. Wilson-Lawrenson's mind as to the sincerity of advertising men here concerning the London Convention, and his report to his executive can hardly fail to be of an emphatically affirmative character.

Prominent advertising, newspaper and business men who have expressed the greatest warmth in the project already include Viscount Leverhulme, Lever Bros., Ltd., Viscount Burnham C. H., the London Daily Telegraph; Lord Ashfield, London Underground Railways; Lord Riddell, representing Newspaper Proprietors' Association; Sir William E. Berry, London Sunday Times, and Cassell & Co., Ltd., &c.; H. Gordon Selfridge, Sir Sidney Skinner, John Barker Stores; Sir Harold Mackintosh, Mackintosh's Toffee; W. S. Crawford, and others. Their support at this juncture promises well for the convention.

For Copyright Revision

A two-day conference between the international printing unions and the Authors' League of America and its various guilds held in New York, January 23 and 24, resulted in the completion of plans to revise the copyright law to permit the United States to join the International Copyright Union. Proposed amendments to the law, soon to be presented to Congress, have been sent to the International Copyright Union at Berlin. Among those attending the conference were Matthew Woll, president of the Allied Printing Trades Union; Peter J. Brady, of the Allied Printing Trades Council of Greater New York, and F. W. Hume of the National Publishers' Association.

WSPAPER men who have learned their business at the case know exactly what I mean when I that The Fun of Being a Fat Man by William Johnston, the rotund member of the editorial staff of The New York World (Little, Brown and Company, Boston), is a nice "fat take" from the season's humorous books. With a bold face, Mr. Johnston asserts with all the weight of his two hundred and fifty pounds that he likes to be fat. The only criticism I would make of the book is that it is too thin. A man the size of Mr. Johnston—mentally speaking, of course—ought to be able to write a thick volume. Yet thin as his book is, it made my wife good natured one night when I was very late for dinner.

What interests me in the book is not so much its humor as its philosophy. Newspaper work is apt to make one cynical. By way of cure, I would prescribe a chapter or two of this volume—to be repeated as often as necessary. A good tonic for continued use is Mr. Johnston's aphorism, "What happens doesn't count. It's what you think about what happens that counts." A note on the jacket of the book says, "If you have enjoyed reading this book or have gained anything from it, won't you make it known to your friends." That is precisely what I am trying to do in this paragraph.

ERNEST ELMO CALKINS, senior member of the advertising agency of Calkins & Holden, New York, has written extensively on the technique of advertising. He has evidently given as careful attention to the technique of being deaf as his charming essay in the current issue of The Atlantic Monthly will show. He offers a valuable suggestion in the matter of a personal inventory of oneself in which formal lists of liabilities and assets are set down. He wonders, for example, whether the mellowed and sunny philosophy of E. S. Martin, "who so nobly filled the editorial chair of Life," is not due to deafness. It may be said that this essay by Mr. Calkins radiates the same mellowed and sunny philosophy.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., Feb. 1.—Ernest Bross, managing editor of the Indianapolis Star for the last 18 years and editorial dean of the Shaffer group of newspapers, passed away at the Methodist Hospital January 31. Bronchial pneumonia, following a year of ill health, was the immediate cause of his death. He was 62 years old, more than forty of which had been spent in newspaper work.

The break in health which now has terminated in his loss to the community and to the Shaffer group of papers, came in February, 1922. At that time a change in climate during the severe weather was advised and he went to Seabreeze, Fla., where he spent two months. Another month at Asheville, N. C., brought further improvement for a time. In June, Mr. Bross started to Chautauqua, N. Y., but his condition became suddenly worse and made his return to Indianapolis imperative. During the past year, editorial as well as general business management has been with B. F. Lawrence and will so continue.

Mr. Bross was born September 1, 1860, at Newago, Mich., of Revolutionary War stock. His education was received at Doane College, Crete, Neb., from which he was graduated in 1881 with the Degree of A. B. and by which he was honored in 1896 with the degree of A. M. He worked his way through college by teaching short terms of school, and with much amusement he used to tell of other days when he sold trees for an Omaha nursery. Immediately upon graduation he went to Omaha and worked as an accountant. There he made the acquaintance of W. J. Cuddy, with whom he later was associated on the Portland Oregonian, then on the Omaha Bee. Mr. Cuddy induced him to join the staff of the Bee, for which he did reportorial work and later editorial work.

Soon thereafter Mr. Bross joined Mr. Cuddy in Portland as a member of the Oregonian staff. He remained there seventeen years, graduating from reporter and editorial writer to managing editor, a position which he held for eight years, 1897 to 1904, writing editorials side by side with the late Harvey W. Scott.

In the latter year, he came to Indianapolis as managing editor of the Star, when John C. Shaffer assumed direction of the paper upon its sale by George F. McCulloch.

Shortly after he came to Indianapolis, Mr. Bross requested B. F. Lawrence, with whom he had been associated on the Oregonian for five years, to join him and the association of the two mained unbroken for twenty-three yea munications which were sent to them on t subject, possibly with negligible exceptions.

Mr. Bross was married to Anne Dic son Parker in Baltimore, September 1894.

"Two days preceding the conference, D William Sheafe Chase of New York, who w actively promoting it, called at the office a Washington paper, and, being unable to cure the publication of any news notice, su mitted a paid advertisement simply announ ing the time and place of the conference a the agencies by which it was called. This a vertisement did not appear as agreed upon, a in company with him I called the followi day to inquire the reason. One of the assistan in the advertising department told us that t advertising manager had instructed him n to admit the advertisement. Inquiring why, said that the manager simply stated that would 'hurt the paper.' I asked how a co ference called by agencies representing millio of church members could be detrimental to news agency or to the public welfare. professed ignorance, but said he was und instruction from the advertising manager n to admit it and could not do so.

"Dr. Chase and I then went to the busine manager of the paper. He insisted that must be mistaken and accompanied us to t advertising department, where the young w confirmed to him in our presence what he h previously told us. The manager then said would take it up with the advertising ma ager, who was absent at the time from t office. That evening someone called Dr. Cha on the telephone, claiming to represent th paper, and said that they had reconsidered a that the advertisement would appear the fo lowing morning—that is, on the day of th conference—but it did not appear.

"A small news notice did appear in anoth paper, also a short announcement, for whi I paid, appeared in the Washington Star. remarked to the manager of the paper whi refused to print our ad, that his refusal to a nounce the conference on a subject of su large public interest, that refusal being ev dently because the motion picture people pa large sums for advertising, would defeat i own ends.

"As chairman, in opening the conference, publicly stated just what had occurred and a sured the gathering that we would be heard every part of this country, notwithstanding th conspiracy of silence imposed upon the publ press by the motion picture interests.

"The 'freedom of the press' of which w have heard much is a farce, a delusion and snare, when any business, for sinister motive can prevent announcement of a public welfa endeavor such as this.

"The liquor traffic in its worst days new exceeded, if indeed it equalled, such method

"Whatever may have been the suspicion people before, that the motion picture interes were subsidizing the press, here is plain an unmistakable evidence.

"In spite of the attitude of the newspaper the conference was highly successful, 27 di ferent national organizations being represente by the delegations present. We never planne nor desired a mass meeting in this instance, bu instead held exactly what we desired, a co ference of representative people who had studie this subject, and were interested in some for of federal control

"Resolutions were passed and a bill wa approved for submission to Congress in whic principles of federal control are definitel included and emphasized."

A Startling Comparison

In Greater Kansas City there are:

90,900 Water Rent Payers
101,102 Natural Gas Users
102,000 Telephone Subscribers
116,520 Electric Light Users
140,292 STAR SUBSCRIBERS*
By City Carriers, 125,818
Newsboys and Stands, 14, 474

This chart shows graphically The Kansas City Star's city circulation as compared with the patrons of the various public utilities

If you had a message for the people of Kansas City, it would be worth a whole lot to deliver it to all the families and business houses who use electric lights, wouldn't it? Or to all the persons who have telephones in their homes, shops or offices? Or to all the gas users? Or to all those who have the convenience of city water?

And yet, if you were to reach all of any one of these classes, or all of them put together, you would have fallen short of getting your message before everybody in Kansas City.

There are districts in Kansas City to which electric lights have not yet penetrated. There are homes without telephones. There are thousands of housewives who for one reason or another do not use gas. Water mains have not yet reached all the newly pioneered residence sections of Kansas City.

But there is no district in all of Greater Kansas City which is not served by The Star's carriers. The home in which The Star is not read twice a day would be as hard to find as the proverbial needle in a haystack.

Look at this chart. A graphic presentation of the thoroughness of The Star's circulation. More Star readers by 22,000 than there are electric light users; more by 36,000 than there are telephone subscribers; more by 37,000 than there are natural gas users; and more by 48,000 than there are water rent payers.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Cheap at $10

January 31, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher: The best ever. You are showing the whole trade paper world how to get out annual numbers which are not only wonderfully constructed, but must be very profitable from every angle.

Ten dollars a copy for your annual number would be cheap to the man of concern who wants all possible data regarding the newspapers of the Anglo-Saxon countries.

Before you started bringing out this basic data the whole industry labored under the handicap of being hidden under a cloud as it were. Some few knew a few of the men on the newspapers, but no one could find a way to know them all.

The new comers into the newspaper and advertising industries do not realize the wonderful strides toward maximum efficiency that have been made possible through the efforts of the Editor & Publisher.

Our friends the advertising agents do not apparently realize that nearly every worth-while advertiser reads and swears by the Editor & Publisher, and do not give you the share of their own advertising which they should.

The people of this old world of ours are not as openly appreciated as they should be when we are among them. Lillies and bouquets after we have passed on may be all well enough, but you certainly are entitled to maximum recognition when with us.

Of Inestimable Value

Brooklyn, N. Y., January 31, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher: I have just been looking over the Editor & Publisher International Year Book for 1923 and congratulate you on this splendid piece of work. It is full of information and data which I am sure is of inestimable value to the newspaper of the country, and to those who have any business dealings with them.

Worth Real Money

New York, January 31, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher: I have just received my copy of your 1923 Year Book, and want to extend my congratulations to you and your staff for the splendid achievement. It certainly reflects an untold amount of hard work and a strong desire to render service, that I am sure will be appreciated by your subscribers. I find information contained in it that is worth real money to me.

Plan for Journalists' Home in Colorado

Denver, Col., January 20, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher: The American Journalists' Club has been formed to provide a home for those who have become incapacitated in newspaper or periodical service. The clubhouse and camp are intended also for the use of active journalists, who may require a rest or a few weeks of health building.

Twenty acres—a superb site overlooking Denver—has been donated for the uses of the club. The executive committee having the work of organization in hand, gives its services without compensation. A board of regents, composed of publishers and editors of national reputation, will in July next relieve the present committee and appoint an executive staff which will have charge of the institution.

Funds for the support of the home will be provided by memberships and by a foundation subscribed by those who recognize the importance of this work. Each $1,000 membership held by a publisher or press club entitles the holder to send one guest to the clubhouse or camp. A room is provided for this guest without charge and the meals will be provided at actual cost.

A journalist retiring with a small income or pension, will find a home here amidst very delightful and most healthful surroundings and but forty minutes' distant from the libraries, theatres and hotels of a large city. An income of a few hundred dollars will go as far at the clubhouse as three times the amount expended in a city.

An active journalist in danger of breaking down can be restored to health and vitality as a guest of the publisher holding the membership, at an expense that is almost nominal.

The co-operation of publishers, press clubs and all interested in the men and women who make American newspapers and periodicals is asked. An immediate subscription of one or two memberships by each of the leading periodicals and press clubs will insure the opening of the club during 1923.

The executive committee will appreciate your careful consideration of these plans and your early co-operation; and it will be thankful for all criticisms and suggestions intended to aid in the development of this too long delayed project.

Jefferson Quotation Verified

Culpepper, Va., January 29, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher:

Answering this query:

Pittsburgh, Pa., January 6, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher: When one sees a notable quotation, attributed to some person of distinction, he is usually inclined to verify its accuracy. Here are three quotations of great interest to the newspaper profession:

"I would rather live in a country with newspapers and without government than in a country with a government but without newspapers."—Thomas Jefferson.

Thomas Jefferson, writing to Col. Edward Carrington, of Virginia, from Paris, under date of January 16, 1787, says:

"The basis of our government being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; were it left to me to decide whether we should have government without newspapers, or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter. But I should mean that every man should receive those papers and be capable of reading them."

Col. Carrington was a Virginia member of the Continental Congress 1785-86. In 1789 he was appointed by President Washington, Marshall of the United States District Court of Virginia. In 1807 he was foreman of the jury in the trial of Aaron Burr. Col. Carrington died October 28, 1810.

Newspaper Work Gives Women Square Deal

Hastings-on-Hudson, N. Y.,
January 22, 1923.

To Editor & Publisher: Enclosed find $4 for my subscription to your valuable paper.

I enjoy best the column of personals about editorial people, staff changes, etc.; also stories like the recent one with pictures announcing changes in the United Press and Scripps; also the interview with Clare Sheridan, in fact any stories which keep us newspaper folk in touch with the rest of the clan.

I like the way you stress the fact that newspapering is a fine and exalted calling, too. Such emphasis keeps the newspaper fraternity "pepped up," and inspires them with new love of the game.

I notice some poor "skirt" out in Ohio complains about women not having any chance in "the game," kept back by men, etc. She doesn't know what she is talking about. If a women can deliver the goods, there's no profession under the sun where she is given better opportunity and gets more chivalrous help from men than in newspapering. At least that's been my experience. I've been Sunday editor, star feature writer, taken assignments to Panama, Washington to write special war stuff, was smuggled aboard President Wilson's special by a good scout of a newspaper man, and got a dandy story—I could give you yards of such instances. If that woman in Ohio hasn't had an even break, it's because she can't write. If you ever want an article giving a different angle on a woman's opportunities in newspapering, let me know.

KANSAS EDITORS VOTE FOR FIELD SECRETARY

Clymer Made President at Topeka Meeting—Little Re-Elected Secretary—Federal Free Publicity Condemned

Decision to employ a field secretary to handle association and service work of the association and condemnation of the policy of the federal government in trying to depend on free publicity to advertise projects which compete with privately owned business were outstanding features of the annual convention of the Kansas Editorial Association at Topeka January 26 and 27.

Rolla Clymer, editor of the El Dorado Times, was elected president of the association; W. F. Hill, Westmoreland Recorder, vice-president, and O. W. Little, of the Alma Enterprise was re-elected secretary. E. A. Pinkerton, of the Glasco Sun, treasurer for the last year, was elected recorder, and J. H. Barley of the Republican Register of Washington, was elected treasurer.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved: That the association commends the practical training given by the department of journalism and printing at the Agricultural College, and urges that these departments receive state support commensurate with their importance.

Resolved: That we recommend to the manufacturers of plates a rigid adherence to the point system thereby saving many hours time in the composing rooms.

Resolved: That in view of the unselfish service of the Kansas editor not only during the war time but in peace—a real service to his town, his county, state and nation—we resent the insinuation of certain politicians during the last campaign that the newspaper men of Kansas are less intelligent, less patriotic, or give less of their service for the general good than other class of citizens, and we condemn as absolutely untrue and entirely uncalled for the charges and insinuations by certain interested parties.

Resolved: That we protest against the persistent attempt of government officials to secure free advertising in the columns of the newspapers, and respectfully represent that the government is as able to pay the regular advertising rates for its publicity as are the banks, building and loan associations and other institutions bidding for the patronage of the people, and that we hereby recommend to all publishers when solicited for free publicity by government paid press agents or officers to definitely decline the same and courteously inform the sender that the government will be required to pay the same rate for its publi as is collected for the same class of ma coming from private or corporate institutio and be it further,

Resolved, That a copy of these resolut be forwarded to the Hon. Lew Wallace, director of government savings and to of the senators and representatives f this state, with the request that an adeq appropriation be made for legitimate newspa advertising, to the end our government no longer be placed in the attitude of a beg in this matter.

It is the plan to finance the work the field secretary this year by volunta subscription. The dues of the associati will remain unchanged. In 1924, howev it is proposed to put the dues on a sch dule according to the circulation of ea paper. A tentative schedule calls for for every 100 subscribers, with a mi mum of $5 and a maximum of $25.

During 1923 the field secretary, it planned, will devote the major portion his time to increasing the membership the association, presenting the organi tion to every editor in the state. T association will be advertised.

The executive committee of the assoc tion has called for subscriptions for t support of this work. The job of fie secretary has been offered to O. W. L tle, of the Alma Enterprise.

Members elected from each district the executive committee are: First d trict, George Harman, Harman Publis ing Company, Valley Falls; second d trict, Drew McLaughlin, Miami Repu lican, Paola; third district, Charles Beel of the Neodesha Daily Sun; fourth d trict, John Redmond, of the Burlingt Republican; fifth district, Fay Seaton, the Manhattan Mercury; sixth district, H. Hale, of the Western Advocate, Ma kato; seventh district, Adna Palmer, the Kingman Leader-Courier; eighth d trict, John Mack, Newton, Kansas.

One of the feature talks was that B. H. Rogers on how to get a page want ads in a country weekly. His pap carries such a page every week and declared dominating circulation was t most important factor in putting want a across.

"We have never solicited a want ad said Mr. Rogers. "They are brought the office or telephoned in. Rural sal are numerous in our county. Much pou try is bought and sold and the spring se son usually finds our want ad page fill for three months or more. Several m in Olathe make their living large through the want ad pages, followi sales, buying and selling, handling their advertising to buy or sell throu the want ad columns. These include liv stock buyers and sellers, dealers in us articles and automobile and accesso salesmen."

EDITORIAL

THE BROTHERHOOD OF SH-SH

THE French have clamped on a censorship in the Ruhr and under its protection secret diplomacy, the greatest foe of peace and human advancement, will carry on its work in full confidence that its crimes will not be known until it is too late; British statesmen speaking in England give Americans their first information about the terms laid down by the United States for the settlement of the British debt; the German Government, through its Embassy, is already whining of atrocities. It has been a big week for secret diplomacy; it has been a menacing week for the people who are going to continue to pay the bills in blood and gold.

With the full realization that the American people must depend upon the old world masters of secret diplomacy for the little news they are permitted to have about their own activities in international affairs, the weekly press conferences with Secretary of State Hughes have become utterly worthless and should be abolished by order of American editors.

The men now assigned to those time-wasting gatherings could be employed much more profitably on assignments where there is at least a chance to get news that is dependable. The American people have been fed up on the other kind.

In the meantime, American correspondents in England, France, Germany, Italy and other countries will continue to dig out the story of this nation's part in the affairs of the world, even though it does carry a foreign flavor and comes late.

Secret diplomacy is the white sheet behind which nations go ku kluxing, and ku kluxing among nations is just as great a danger to established government as ku kluxing among races or religious faiths.

America was sincere when she went to war to put an end to war and abolish secret diplomacy, the cause of past wars; America still holds to those ideals, and a frightened "Sh-sh" is not going to prevent it from finally finding the truth and doing its part in rebuilding the world on it. The press of the nation must be the agency through which the people work to the better future and it is to the extent the press functions as that agency that it will profit in public confidence in the future.

The world will get back to normal, so far as the individual is concerned, just as soon as there is frank, open discussion and settlement on the basis of truth and justice. There can be no lasting peace so long as the truth goes into dark recesses of confidential files and our own Secretary of State turns his back to all demands for information on every question vital to the future peace of our people.

With all the blunders of the peace that was written, we were, nevertheless, traveling the highway that would lead to a brotherhood among men yesterday. But today we are in the grip of the Brotherhood of Sh-sh, manikins dangling in the dark.

ETHICS IN JOURNALISM

THERE is a growing demand among newspaper men who honor their profession to place it upon a higher plane. This is shown in the increasing interest that is being taken in the subject of ethics.

The Arkansas Press Association is the latest to fall into line by adopting an ethical code for the guidance of its members at a recent meeting held in Little Rock. A standing committee on ethics was appointed to serve for a period of five years, and there is every indication that the members intend going into the matter thoroughly.

Journalistic ethics will be one of the subjects discussed at the New York State Conference to be held at Ithaca on February 12 and 13. The Newspaper Club of New York adopted a code in the early days of its organization and is now redrafting it.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER welcomes this wide interest in a subject of such great importance to the profession, but it feels that a code in itself is not enough. With it there must be a pledge for the individual based on the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That amendment means more to journalism than most newspaper men realize and better acquaintance with it would be a good thing for everybody.

AN AMERICAN'S CREED

COMPILED BY CHARLES W. MILLER

Vicksburg (Miss.) Herald

WHO is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commanded it not? Out of the mouth of the most High proceedeth not evil and good? wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord? Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens. We have transgressed and have rebelled: Thou has not pardoned.—(Lam. iii : 37-42.) Therefore by their fruits ye shall know them. Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in heaven.—(Matt. vii : 20, 21). Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, This people draweth nigh unto Me with their mouth and honoureth Me with their lips; but their heart is far from Me.—(Matt. xv : 7, 8). If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.—(James i : 5)

TAPS FOR THE POSTAL COMMISSION

INVESTIGATION of second-class mail costs and methods by a joint postal commission, composed of Senators and Representatives, met its just fate the other day. It was killed by the House and awaits only a decent burial. With economy, economy, economy, shouted in its ears by White House and nation, the House is in no mood to listen to requests for $75,000 from a commission which has spent four times that amount in two years and has accomplished absolutely nothing, not even the preliminary steps which would enable it to spend more money with some prospect of results. And the answer is that investigation of postal costs is again placed where it belongs —with the Post Office.

That is promising. It is encouraging for the publishers. And, like all proposals of Congress, it needs to be watched closely for jokers. It must be made to be what it seems to be. The $500,000 that Congress is willing to vote for additional Post Office clerks and inspectors for the investigation may be plenty if the clerks and inspectors are chosen for the job in hand. It may be only pork if politicians are selected and turned loose on an investigation without specific instructions and limitations. There is no doubt that an honest, thorough investigation of the costs of handling publications in the mails would be productive of good not only for the publications but for the Government. And there is likewise no question that a political investigation would be as useless as has been the career of the joint postal commission composed of members of Congress.

Sight should not be lost, however, of the fact that an investigation of postal costs has no bearing on the publishers' demands for and need of relief from charges that were imposed by haters of the press under cover of war legislation. This relief has been granted to every other industry. It was promised to the publishers before last Election Day. It was refused after the people had given their biennial rebuke to the men who had misrepresented them in Congress.

Politics placed the burden on the newspapers and magazines, and politics has kept it intact. If politics can impose it, politics can also remove it and should do so immediately. The relief can be temporary, subject to such amendment as the postal investigators find necessary, but it should be made effective before the next fiscal year of the Government is ended. If it is too late to expect the present Congress to keep the pledged word of its members, it is not too early to bring the light of reason to its successor.

"KULTUR" AND NEW YORK'S PRESSMEN

BERNSTORFF of 1916 and the German Reich 1922 would seem to be the models chosen New York web pressmen in their relations w the newspaper publishers. The tactics of stall whine which have made the German diplomats stench in the nostrils of civilized peoples find an cellent counterpart in the actions of President Da Simons and his union during the past two years.

There is no need to retell the story of the negot tions throughout 1921 which led to arbitration year ago after the publishers had declared themsel finished with the union's quibbling and evasion. N ther is there need for lengthy treatment of the unio tactics since last February when Judge Manton hand down his award of wages and working conditio The union could not make effective its unreasona demands upon the publishers and it has spent the ent year since then in making unpleasant the task of newspapers in enforcing the contract. No spirit co-operation has been evident. Dispute has follow dispute. The publishers' committee have spent most as much time listening to futile union quibb as they have in the conduct of their newspapers.

When the union chiefs egged on the Evening Wo pressmen to a walkout on Election Night and induc the publishers to arbitrate the point they raised whether overtime could be required under the contra they lost their case at arbitration. Their latest is take an obiter dictum of that arbitration award a make of it a supreme provision of their contract w the publishers. That contract plainly provides t "reasonable notice shall be given by the publisher the workmen of hours it is desired that they labo Judge Hand, in the later case, discussing the gene question of industrial relations, observed "that newspapers must . . . give the men notice duri each week of what the shifts will be during the s ceeding week, including any proposed overtime, exc in cases of sudden emergencies." The union mak the week's notice of overtime paramount.

Of course, the publishers have refused to be bou by the union's interpretation of Judge Hand's int pretation of Judge Manton's award, as being totally variance with trade practices of the past thirty yea Its folly need not be pointed out to anyone conversa with the newspaper business, probably not even to pressmen themselves. The union demand is not p sented in sincerity, but with the idea of bartering impossibility for some other concession that is theirs under their present contract. It is the Germ idea throughout.

It is not the province of EDITOR & PUBLISHER advise the New York publishers or the pressmen to the conduct of their business, but the obvious c not be avoided. Germany wasn't beaten by writi notes and it isn't likely that the pressmen will brought to their senses by continuing the weekly change of letters that has marked the past year.

FINISHED PRODUCT ONLY?

IRVING BRANT makes a serious charge agai the American press in the leading article of t issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER. This is not a bo hurled from the outside. Brant is inside. He is editor of the editorial page of one of the countr big newspapers.

In reading this article one cannot help but ponc whether or not the editorial executive personnel of t United States must not assume responsibility for t condition that existed in 1917 and today.

If the treaties and agreements, secret but bindi that were the ruling factors in the peace that w written at the close of the World War, had be sent out by a recognized news service or had be offered by a feature syndicate, we wonder whether not they would have been printed?

A shell-shocked press can be excused for its m takes and blunders, but certainly there is no alibi f a press that has ceased to function on its own initiati

The charge has been made that less than twel men are doing the thinking for the press of the natio that managing editors have become buyers of a fi ished product, and not originators of new ideas.

Whether this is true or not the fact remains th so-called "big news" comes by wire, and digging rapidly becoming a lost art.

Perry Takes Over Minneapolis News

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Feb. 2.—John H. Perry arrived in Minneapolis yesterday to formally take over the Minneapolis Daily News, which he and Richard Lloyd Jones recently purchased. Mr. Lloyd Jones, who is now ill in New York, is expected to come here shortly for a three months' stay to reorganize the paper. No personnel changes of any kind have been announced to date. W. A. Frisbie continues in charge. Mr. Perry said there was no statement he wished to make at present. The News appeared yesterday with the line—"One of the Perry-Lloyd Jones Newspapers" on the editorial page masthead.

Northcliffe Will Settlement

The settlement effected in the dispute over the will of the late Lord Northcliffe was sanctioned by the courts February 1, according to a cable from London, though no details were announced. Sir John Simon stated the compromise "left no loophole for further controversy." Counsel appeared in behalf of the infants whose interests are now protected under the will. Lord Justice Duke pronounced against the wills dated July 8 and July 21 and the alleged codicil dated October 8, 1922, and confirmed the other will and codicil, which made bequests to the infants and to charities.

Charge Newsdealer with Fraud

The United States Post Office Department has issued a fraud order against Rafael Gonzales, of Orzaba, Mexico, who has been writing publishers asking them to send him 50 or 75 copies of their Sunday papers, for which he promised $100 upon receipt of the first shipment. According to the post office he never remitted, but disposed of the papers at such profit as he was able to make.

DOLLAR PULLERS

Advertising and circulation managers are always on the lookout for new ideas that will increase advertising receipts and win new circulation. Your idea for increasing advertising or circulation may not appeal to your manager, but it may be just the thing that some other manager wants. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each idea printed under this head. The fact that the idea is now being used in your city does not bar it from the department. Address your communication to the DOLLAR PULLER EDITOR. When they appear clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable ideas will not be returned.

THERE is a tip for live circulation managers in towns rightly situated, in a stunt put over last year at Billings, Mont., the Gazette benefiting. The manager of the Keefe, Automotive Supply Co., each morning made a trip out to the tourist camping grounds, reaching there about 6.30. The grounds are a mile from town. He gave to each visitor a morning paper, the Gazette, with a sticker attached, "Good morning, Mr. Tourist," wishing the visitor pleasure while visiting Montana. The same stunt was put over at Livingston, Mont. There are thousands of towns and cities which have their auto camp ground, and this would be a good stunt at any of them. It boosts the town, the newspaper and the enterprising advertiser.—J. T. B.

Spring cleaning time will soon be here, and it would be a good stunt for the paper to get up a page of ads of concerns dealing in vacuum cleaners, and to use some such line as this over the page: "A Vacuum Cleaner Will Make Your Spring Cleaning Easier." Spring housecleaning time can be made a big business building time for the sale of vacuum cleaners, and so many concerns dealing in vacuum cleaners would be glad to come in such a page as this.—F. H. W.

A Missouri newspaper recently conducted a "Want Ad Week," and increased the patronage of its classified department. For ten days previous to the week set, it put on an advertising campaign, acquainting the public with the value of Want Ads, the opportunities they offer, the interesting reading they afford, etc. It used newspaper space, direct by mail and picture slides in this campaign of publicity. A special price of six insertions for the price of five was made for the week. The motor car dealers came across with fine lists of used cars, the real estate men increased their space, and dealers in poultry and eggs came in from the country. On the first day of "Want Ad Week" this newspaper set twice its usual number of Want Ads and came out with the largest classified section it had ever run.—F. W. R.

A hardware merchant here is using space to advertise a stove. He offers the stove at the regular price the first day and then reduces it one dollar each day until someone buys it. The first one went at a very slight reduction.—H. J. W.

The Cornwall (N. Y.) Press is sending to all its advertisers and agents a telephone memoranda book, thumbnail indexed and bound in blue pinseal leather, with the name of each recipient imprinted in gold on the lower right hand corner of the cover. The inside front and back covers each carry a dignified service announcement of the Cornwall Press. Indeed the book is handsome enough to grace the parlor of any home. Irwin Ronk, editor of the Press, reports that clients of the Press are showing their appreciation of the gift.—R.

An Ohio newspaper is now urging its readers to have their cars overhauled and ready for spring. Co-operating with local dealers whose display advertisements are carried on the page, it invites them to visit any of these dealers for an inspection of the car at the newspaper's expense. While they are not required to have any needed repairs done at that shop, the supposition is, they will. Under the agreement with the dealers, this inspection is made at a very minimum cost to the newspaper.—B. A. T.

The Boulder News-Herald, putting over with local merchants a fashion show, originated a secret slogan containing twenty-odd letters. One different letter from the slogan, on a card, was displayed in the window of each of an equal number of News-Herald advertisers. A $10 prize was offered for the first correct slogan submitted, together with a list of the stores in which the letters were displayed. The contestants were not told which stores participated—they had to search and find them. The slogan incorporated the "Buy at home" idea. This good stunt helped put over the fashion show, and in addition pleased advertisers.—J. T. B.

An advertising solicitor called on a dentist who said he didn't believe it paid to advertise. After having several of his propositions turned down, the solicitor said: "Just let me run this ad for you two weeks, and pay me a five per cent commission on the new business it brings you." "All right," said the dentist, "I'll keep account of the new customers it brings me, and pay you a five per cent commission at the end of two weeks." At the end of two weeks the solicitor returned to the dentist's office; the dentist opened his ledger and read: "Four sets of teeth, $120; nine crowns, $36; pulling teeth, $15; a total of $171, so I owe you $8.50 for this little ad." "Thank you," said the solicitor, "shall I run the ad again on this basis?" "No," said the dentist, "just run it at your regular rates."—B. F. C.

It is much harder to get an advertiser started than it is to hold him after once started. One Oregon newspaper has made regular advertisers out of a number of business houses of the city by getting them started with two-inch surrounded (island position) ads. Several who had repeatedly said that advertising could do them no good, and who were started this way, have been every-week advertisers for years, and of course, now take much larger space than that used as a teaser. Another business man who said he would advertise if the newspaper could prove that anyone read his ads, and who left it to the advertising solicitor to write the copy, was immediately made an every-week advertiser. The teaser used in this case was in news story form, and the advertiser himself read it down to his name before he realized that it was a piece of advertising.—E. B.

The St. Louis Star, which has been giving free travel accident insurance for the death or injury of any reader during the term of his subscription, is taking display space in its own paper to advertise the payment of insurance in each case that arises. There have been 350 such cases since the Star inaugurated the policy about three years ago, an average of two a week; however, only five deaths have resulted from these accidents. The name and address of the injured man or woman to whom the insurance is immediately paid is published. This makes a very favorable impression on all of the injured person's friends and acquaintances, bringing many new subscriptions.—D. R.

Why not run a state campaign to increase circulation? The Cheyenne (Wyo.) State Tribune is running a campaign from January 15 to June 1. They claim it is not a contest but merely a bit of friendly rivalry between individuals, clubs or societies in the incorporated towns of Wyoming. Every cent collected on old subscriptions will be counted as one vote. Every cent collected on new subscriptions will be counted as two votes. On June 1, the person or club having the most votes will receive $150; second largest, $100, and third largest, $50.—A. R. D.

Many people like a little variety in the bread they eat every now and then, but they are entirely unfamiliar with all the varieties baked by the various concerns in their city. It would, therefore, be a good stunt for the paper to get up a page of ads of local bakeries in each of which ads the bakery would tell about the different kinds of bread it bakes. An appropriate heading urging people to try different varieties of bread, would help to sell the page.—F. H. W.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat recently secured from Washington University, which is located just outside the city's limits of St. Louis, a display advertisement soliciting part time employment wanted by students earning their way through college. Business men and others needing help of various kinds were asked to call upon the Board of Recommendations of the university for needy students. The available labor supply which was listed included almost everything between a tutor and a janitor, or between a stenographer and a housemaid. This should suggest a field for new advertising from your local college as well as a good feature story about the many different and perhaps unusual ways that students in your city are earning money to pay for an education. Writing Hunches and Dollar Pullers might be one.—D. R.

The Paris (Texas) Morning News guarantees the results of its want ads. That is, if there is no result, there is no payment. By result is meant that the News want ad will put the advertiser in touch with prospects, and not that the entire deal will be consummated. If there is no response to the want ad, then there is no payment. At intervals, the News runs advertisements giving instructions as to the writing of want ads, and outlines the information that should be contained in each class of such ads.—W. L. M.

HUNCHES

Managing editor and city editors are always on the lookout for news; and feature ideas that can be used locally. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each hunch published under this head. The fact that the hunch is not being worked successfully in your city does not bar it from this department. Address your contributions to the HUNCH EDITOR. When they appear, clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable hunches will not be returned.

IF your vicinity has been subjected to a good amount of snowfall this year, you have an opportunity to get some good features by looking around town for snow artists, not the kids who build the common snow man, but real down and out would-be sculptors who take delight in creating snow statuary about their grounds. Papers in Rochester, N. Y., have found snow lions and other animals, in addition to many genuine Eskimo igloos. Cuts should feature the stories.—J. R. E.

A British publication calls attention to the effort being made by the Cape Argus, South Africa, to assist in the solution of the housing proposition in the Cape Province. It has invited competitive designs for a model house of from three to five rooms for which it offers a premium of 100 guineas for the first selection and 50 for the second. Arrangements have been made with a local building firm to erect the houses selected, and with capital to secure building loans on easy repayment plans, the Argus serving as intermediary between all parties concerned. The Argus is giving much publicity to the undertaking, and it is attracting attention all over South Africa, it is said.—W. H. M.

How strongly do you dwell on the particular industry or business that is the mainstay of your community? The Boston Transcript devotes much space to peculiarly New England industries and businesses. Papers in automobile cities too frequently give their space to "canned publicity," instead of to real news and views of the industry. The same may be said of papers in mining towns, farm communities and others. Real news of the vital local industry and conditions affecting it is strong stuff. —R. M. F.

The Williamsport Sun recently carried a human interest story relating to the mail received by prisoners in the county court house, that city. It developed that one morning delivery included several seed catalogs and various bulletins from mail order houses as well as other answers to advertisements. Investigation by a reporter revealed that the prisoners liked to receive mail, and resorted to various means that their desires along this particular line might be gratified. Interesting is the fact that while the prisoners gave as their address the number and street of their involuntary abode, they failed to mention "County Jail." Perhaps a similar feature could be developed in your city.—H. E. R.

Commercial paper is little understood by a large number of people—perhaps, even, by a majority—in spite of the fact that most of them have more or less frequent occasion to use one or more forms of it. Even such simple things as checks and drafts are mysteries to a surprisingly large number. Why not run a series of non-technical, yet authoritative and thorough articles, describing the various more common forms? The first article might deal with checks, the second with bank drafts, the third with promissory notes, and so on. If the small town paper could get some well known bank official or employee to write them, and if the paper in the larger place could secure the services of someone connected with a prominent bank, so much the better. If that plan were impracticable, some member of the editorial or reportorial staff could handle the assignment, being careful, however, to check up with some bank official or employee capable of detecting errors or ambiguities.—T. A. H.

In many public schools nowadays the principals examine new pupils to see just what their mentality is and just where they belong. Why wouldn't it be a good idea to write a resume of these tests and then urge all the adult readers of the paper to try the test on themselves and see just how they'd stack up in such a test? Of course, with the tests it would be a good plan to show which grades the pupils are put into according to the answers they give to the tests.—F. H. W.

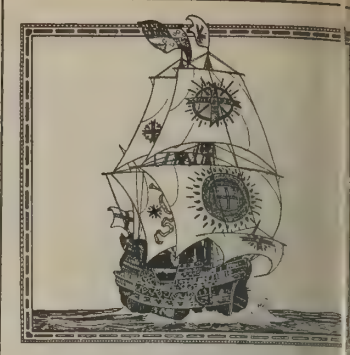
In the comic pictures we are often shown the clever methods of serving summonses to unwilling summonees. But near San Jose, Cal., a summons was recently served by dropping it down from an aeroplane in front of an auto. The motorist stopped, picked it up, and then found that it was just what he was trying to run away from. Talk with your local summoners, and write up some of their interesting expriences.—P. E. M.

"How Your City Is Run"—A series of articles dealing with the functions of the various departments of the municipality. Good educational stuff which readers appreciate—and which make friends for the newspaper in the city offices.—A. D. B.

To what city do the greatest number of long distance phone calls from your town go? What proportion of the long distance phone calls from your town go to places within a radius of fifty miles? What proportion go to places within a radius of 100 miles? What are the longest calls from your town within the past three months? Where were these calls to? What are the busiest hours of the day in the long distance department of your local phone company? A story along this line would be novel and very interesting—F. H. W.

How many old buildings are there in your city which were originally erected as churches, and which are now utilized for some other purpose? To what various uses have they been put since being abandoned as churches? We find one which was changed from a church to a boarding house, and is now a granite shop. Another is now a screw fatcory, and so on. A little investigation will show up plenty of material for a good story.—C. E. L.

Along with a half a column article on the use of fuel oil for industrial purposes which was published in the St. Louis Star recently with credit to a trade journal in that particular field from which the article was clipped, there appeared in the Star 13 small advertisements totaling a little more than a quarter of a page from local dealers in fuel oil, fuel oil burners, pumps, tanks, etc. This same idea can be worked with many fields that have not as yet been exploited by your local papers. Technical articles of merit and authority are easily available from technical journals or can prepared by one of the men in the trade of your city. —D. R.



Ordinarily dry stuff from the municipal treasurer's office in cities from 20,000 to 150,000 can be worked into a daily feature by running, under the head "Where Your Money Goes," brief facts regarding payments made by the office. Every check of more than $10,000 has some interesting fact behind it. One paper under this heading told of a payment of $60,000 on a water loan bond, giving the date of construction of the works for which the money had been borrowed, the total cost, the total amount paid to date and the amount remaining due.—M. T.

"Who's Abroad in Town from Midnight to Four A. M.," was the title of an interesting story recently run by a Michigan paper. They did not take somebody else's word for it, but put a reporter on the street during those hours to see for himself. Some interesting and amusing facts can be brought out, especially in the smaller cities where the average person would probably say that no one was on the street at those hours. In the larger cities, of course, there is much interesting and little appreciated work done during the night.—C. E. L.

Hundreds of "human interest items," not considered in the general course of the day's news, are passed over every day by newspaper editors and reporters. By using just such little items a certain Western Missouri newspaper editor has built up a very interesting and popular department. Under the heading "Escaped the Waste Basket," he gives each week spicy paragraphs—sometimes it is a bit of conversation he has had a part in, sometimes an interesting incident, often the cute sayings of his neighbors' children, but everything in this column comes out of his own experience. It has local flavor.—F. W. R.

Throughout the United States at the present time the youth of the country is being interested in calf club work. It is usually started in the rural school when the teacher teaching dairying, explains the need of better blood in herds. Usually an adjacent county is taken as an example. This is followed by a sense of jealousy on the part of the local pupils. The result is the formation of a calf club and the securing of herd animals that will mean in future years dairy cattle, registered, tuberculin tested and of purer stock.—L. J. J.

What is the daily life of a high school senior in your city like? What does he study? When does he study it? What athletic activities does he engage in? What are his social recreations? The answer to all these questions would make a very interesting and novel story.—F. H. W.

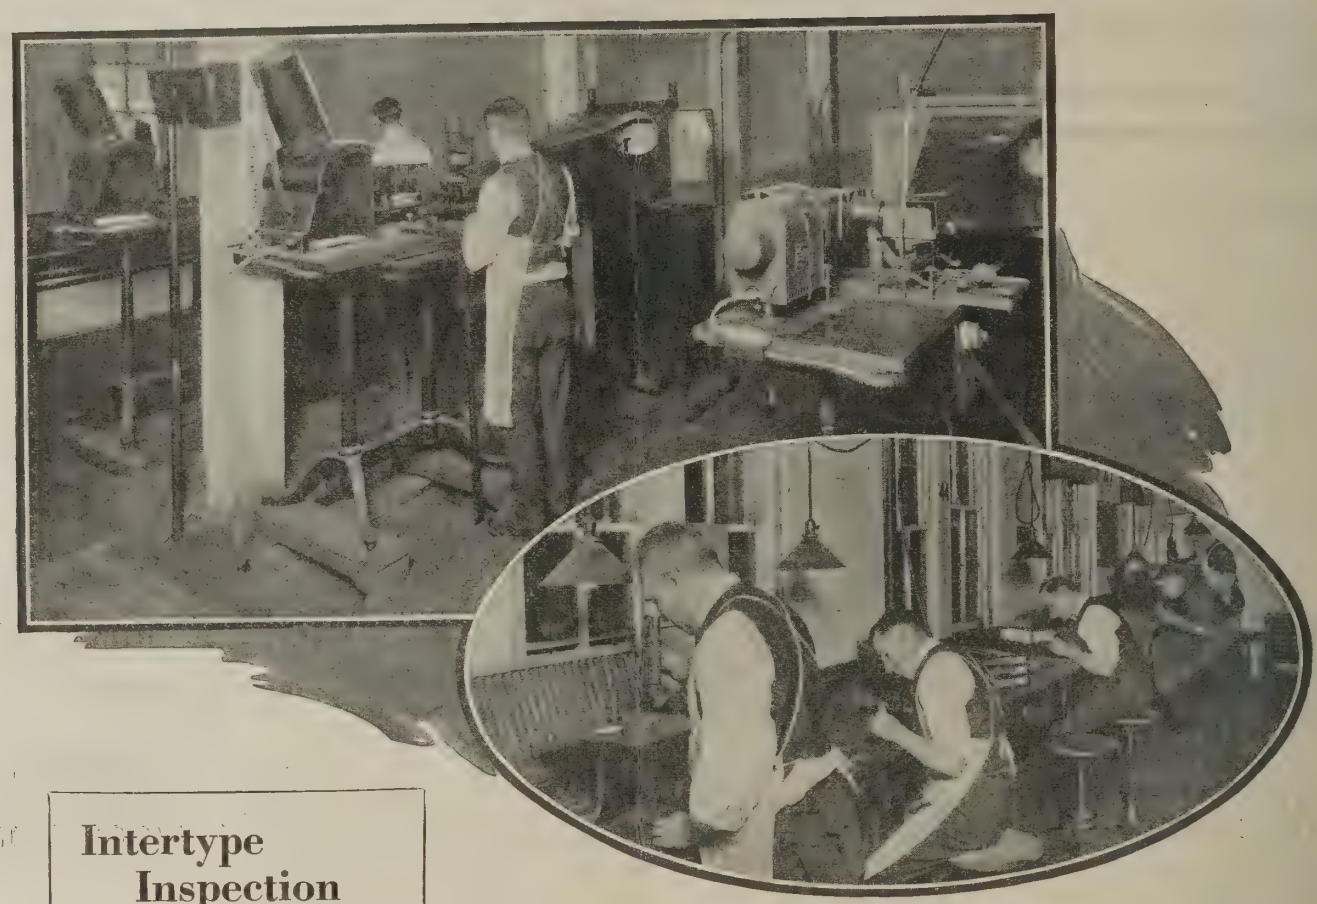
Katisha's Shoulder Blade

One of the beautiful consolations of statistics—the bible of business—is that they may be "split" in so many ways that anybody and everybody may recieve "a little something" therefrom.

It was upon the perfection of her shoulder blade, you remember, that Katisha based her claim to being the most beautiful woman in Japan.



Katisha's shoulder blade—a newspaper's leadership in prune advertising—a golden day of supremacy for him who is the "dub" of his class the remaining 364—these are some of the comforts of "split statistics."

But they who survive the tests of brutal totality, proving year in and year out leadership by all the standards that apply to their line—they indeed are entitled to the rewards of premiership that they receive. Of such is the kingdom of the successful.

For many years—and to-day—all authoritative yearly statistics of daily newspaper advertising prove

Intertype Inspection of Matrices

Intertype matrix inspections begin with the raw brass, which is made to our own specifications, and continue throughout the manufacturing operations, of which there are more than fifty. When the matrices are completed, inspections are made of all dimensions, as well as depth, alignment, and side position of character. The lower illustration shows some of the final Intertype matrix inspections.

One of the inspections during manufacture is shown in the upper picture. The matrices are placed in projecting machines which enlarge the characters sixty times. Careful measurements are then made to determine accuracy of alignment and side position.

INTERTYPE superiority of design is very apparent to anyone who sees a demonstration of the machine, and all publishers and printers are invited to arrange with us at any time for such a demonstration.

To those who cannot also see, by a personal inspection of the Intertype Factories, how carefully the Intertype is built, we submit the records of Intertypes nearly ten years old, which have demonstrated remarkable durability of construction and low cost of maintenance.

Philadelphia with 400,000 separate dwellings, will buy your electric and gas devices for the home

165,000 of the houses and apartments in Philadelphia use electric current. Practically every one of the more than 400,000 individual dwellings in the city is equipped to use gas.

Nearly 10,000 new dwellings were erected in Philadelphia in 1922 and an extensive building program is now under way.

The market for electric and gas appliances in Philadelphia is growing. Philadelphia's workers—both men and women—are earning salaries and wages which enable them to buy articles to increase their home comforts and to reduce the household work.

You can reach practically every family in the third largest market in America—tell them why they should use your products—by advertising in The Bulletin.

The Bulletin every evening goes into nearly every household in Philadelphia, Camden and their suburbs.

EEDING THE WORLD'S PRESS AT LAUSANNE

porters Virtually Reduced to Picking Up Crumbs from Lips of Press Agents of Interested Powers—News Handout System at Conference Came Perilously Near to Journalistic Mendicancy.

By WILLIAM T. ELLIS

VENEZIA, Italy, Jan. 27.

by day, as I watched the English-saking correspondents at Lausanne about the British Foreign Office enan, like pigeons at St. Mark's, flocking to the tourist with corn, t myself in rebellion. Perhaps my f journalism are too high; or else e archaic, or even too progressive. rate, this procedure seems an af- o the public whom these eminent ondents represent. "Better no t all," I mused, "than news ob- n this fashion. This is the 'hand- duced perilously near to journal- endicancy."

ider the situation. A conference d powers is in session. Primarily, et to make peace between the de- Greeks and the victorious Turks; it is charged with the task of re- ing the relations between Europe ther Asia. The ominous ancient between East and West is here decisively. Nothing more impor- ithin this vast sphere of interest pened since the fall of Constanti- e in 1453. All the elements of a tuman drama are engaged. From yangle, the news is of surpassing nce to mankind. In recognition h, the press associations and great pers have sent their best men to he story. And here they are re- o picking up crumbs from the lips ress agent of one of the interested e!

y in the Conference, secret diplo- cored its usual victory—for Euro- statecraft has had no essential of mind for a hundred years. The War appears to have escaped its usness entirely, so far as practical go. None of the sessions of the ne Conference were to be open to ss. All participants were enjoined recy—although the British and began to report to their nationals he first. After a few days, all ce of obedience to the rules of e was dropped. Each group gives to what it wants the public to two big European powers do it y, in systematic fashion, and the and the Greeks talk with their ual friends among the correspon- or those who may seek them out. merican "observers" take the po- hat they are not at liberty to re- e proceedings even to their own ls, confining their outgivings to ly phrased copies or summaries of fficial statements before the com- .

sellor McClure, the largest man at nference, attends the full sessions British publicity man. The French Turks, I was told, have similar aries present. They also receive heir officials in attendance state- of what happens at the meeting of b-committee, for transmission to ss.

ously, if it is permissible for pro- l press agents to witness the pro- s of the Conference, each in behalf national propaganda, it would be e reasonable to admit the disinter- orrespondents themselves: for the only difference between three or four reporters and thirty or forty is greater fullness and fairness of view. The public would have a square deal and news would come out unfiltered. If the rule of secrecy was broken for the press agents, it could not reasonably be sustained against the disinterested reporters of the world's newspapers. Sweet reasonableness and consistency are not, however, traits of the old diplomacy; each nation at Lausanne winks at its own and the other nations' violations of the rule of the Conference. Each is given a free field for its own propaganda.

One practical and rather amusing result of this procedure is that the Conference, which is in all things roughly divided into two camps, maintained rival headquarters for news. The official "Cercle de Presse" is located in the Palace Hotel, far up on the hill, in Lausanne proper, above the upper terminus of the funicular railway which has at its lower end the Chateau on Lake Leman where the Conference sessions are held. This "press club" supplies long rows of tables, with occasional typewriters, a reading room, an "American bar,"—with a barmaid!—and a French journalist in charge. Telegraph and telephone facilities are provided. Many of the correspondents phone their stories to Paris. At the other end of the same hotel, the official French spokesman holds daily conferences with the European journalists and with those from Turkey, Egypt and Syria. Only rarely does an English-speaking correspondent attend.

There are far more continental correspondents at the Conference than British and American combined. At the Palace they fraternize freely, French being the common tongue, with their fellow craftsmen from Turkey, Syria and Egypt. There are also two or more Japanese newspaper men in the same hotel.

The chiefs of the Turkish delegation are far more accessible than any others. The Greeks, overshadowed by Mr. Venizelos and his bodyguard, dwell apart in another hotel, and are pathetically ignored, especially since the execution of the ministers. There are no outward signs that Greece is one of the principal parties to the peace treaty that is being considered.

In still another hotel, and treated as rather beyond the pale, being invited to none of the many official dinners that are exchanged, dwell the Russians. Tchitcherin talked freely to the correspondents at first, but later, after establishing a rather untactful Russian Jew as his publicity watch-dog, who insisted on a preliminary inquisition with the correspondent, and upon written questions to be submitted in advance, the chief of the Russians was forgotten by the press men. Possibly he has come to the conclusion by this time that he needs the newspaper men more than the newspaper men need him.

In the sumptuous Beau Rivage Hotel, down on the beautiful waterfront, alongside the Chateau, the activities of the American and British press men are concentrated. In this hostelry the large British delegation and staff are housed, as well as the Americans, the Italians, the Roumanians, the Belgians, the Bulgarians, the Iraquans and the lone Arab delegate, from the Hejaz, clad in latest London styles, with an English valet.

It is here that, twice a day, McClure meets the English-speaking correspondents, with only rarely a continental or Asiatic representative among them. A delightful personality, McClure, who is counsellor of the British Embassy at Rome, with some previous newspaper experience, is not in the same class with Lord Riddell, whose smooth proficiency as a press agent American correspondents learned to admire at the Washington Conference. But the very skill of Riddell made him persona non grata to the French at San Remo, so he cannot again fill his familiar role at an international conference. McClure's work is rather cruder: he has no decided flair for news, and no gift of succinct statement. His summaries reflect Lord Curzon's schoolteacher attitude toward the Turks, "Really, now, these people are quite impossible, you know," and such like remarks, interlard his forthgivings. He makes no effort whatsoever to conceal the strictly British and partisan character of his statements. It is avowedly the Conference from the British viewpoint. To get the other side, one must journey up the hill to the French and Turkish headquarters; and, since the press sessions are assembled at the same hour, this is practically impossible.

Of course, the newspaper men were heartily tired of the Conference by Christmas. Many left about the first of the year; and still others when the Ruhr story broke. Some continued to the end, unable even to get away for half a day's sport in the snow, less than an hour distant up the mountains.

Somehow, I got a new idea of the philosophic patience of the men of the press waiting, waiting, waiting, for news to occur. Some day, I predict, while waiting for a diplomatic "hand-out" at an international conference, they will follow the example of the American correspondent at Paris and start an insurrection of their own, in behalf of "open covenants openly arrived at."

BRITISH AD CLUBS' DELEGATION TO SAIL FOR U. S. MAY 26

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

London Editor, EDITOR & PURLISHER

Special Cable to EDITOR & PUBLISHER

London, England, Feb. 8.—Viscount Rothermere, head of the London Daily Mail, has stated definitely that he is solidly behind the organization of the delegation which will represent Great Britain at the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, to be held in Atlantic City in June, and endeavor to bring the 1924 meeting to London.

Organizers have already approached numerous large British manufacturers on the subject of backing for the advertising convention, if it can be obtained for London, and already the replies are encouraging.

It is impossible to say at the present moment what the numerical strength of the British delegation will be, but EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S correspondent expects to know definitely next week. Arrangements are in hand to reserve all necessary accommodations on the Berengaria, sailing for New York May 26.

Lord Rothermere has written Mr. F. A. Wilson-Lawrenson, representing the 1924 A. C. C. W. On-to-London Committee, under date of January 25, as follows:

"Will you convey to your committee the assurance of my hearty support of the 1924 convention, whose members I hope to see in London? My journals will assist in every way to make the convention in London a success and I now inform the committee that my journals will contribute 5,000 pounds towards the expense."

YEARLY EXCHANGE OF JOURNALISTS URGED BY W. LINTS SMITH

London Times Executive, Returned from American Visit, Believes Press Should Start Reciprocal Flow of British and American Citizens for Welfare of the World

INTERCHANGE of journalists between Great Britain and the United States is again brought to the front by W. Lints Smith, of the London Times, in a brief survey of his impressions gathered during his recent visit here, written for EDITOR & PUBLISHER on his return to England. He is an enthusiastic supporter of the proposition which has been advocated many times by EDITOR & PUBLISHER since America aligned itself with the Allied Powers in the war and hopes that it may be brought to fruition in the near future.

"The future welfare of the world rests largely with the English-speaking peoples," he writes, "and anything that can can be done to get us nearer to each other should be done. Personal contact is far and away the best way to dispel prejudices and doubts. I wish British citizens would visit the United States in larger numbers. More Americans come to England than Englishmen go to America. Yet the British people are much traveled. I believe it would be possible by means of an international organization to have an exchange of some of our citizens for brief periods. They would, of course, have to be of the right type, and thoroughly guaranteed. From what I have experienced of American hospitality, I think you would have no objection to entertaining even in your own homes the educated responsible Britisher, and certainly he would not, so far as the American of the same category is concerned.

"The newspapers of our countries might very well set the example in a practical and limited way. Some years ago, I remember, such a proposal was not only mooted but seriously discussed by us in England and the Newspaper Proprietors' Association, of which every leading London paper is a member, gave it hearty support. Mr. Melville E. Stone, who was then on our side of the Atlantic, was enthusiastic in regard to the idea. I am not so sure that he was not the sponsor. In any case we are like Barkis, very willing, and I think EDITOR & PUBLISHER might place all newspapers workers under one more debt of gratitude by taking the matter in hand. Briefly the proposal was that there should be an interchange of journalists. A British newspaper would 'co-opt,' say, two men or women on its staff every year for one year, and an American paper would reciprocate. It does not require much imagination to realize that in twenty years or so, if the leading papers on both sides adopted the plan, we would have in both countries a small army of the very best ambassadors who would help their countrymen to interpret our respective real things and outlook.

"The size of your leading newspapers is a consequent wonder to us in Great Britain," Mr. Smith continued. "The Times on occasions is 32 pages, apart from supplements which are added now and then. That is considered to be very large with us. But you have newspapers which daily exceed that size—for instance, the New York Times with 40 pages—and your Sunday issues are monumental. It is all of course made possible by the greater volume of advertisements which American newspapers obtain compared with ours. We envy you. There is another aspect which interests me. Your readers seem to have got accustomed to these very large papers. In Great Britain they have not, and that is one of our difficulties on the Times in producing anything over say—24 pages, which is an unusually large size for British newspapers. The Times, however, would cease to be the Times if it attempted to deal with the world's activities, plus advertising, in the 12 or 16 pages of which the average British newspaper consists. I have no doubt the point has been carefully considered, but I should have thought there was room in New York for an American 'Daily Mail.'

"It looked to me that advertising in the United States is in a very healthy state. In Great Britain we have passed through two or three extremely lean years. There was something of a 'boom' in 1919, but it did not last long. One unfavorable condition followed upon another. The aftermath of the war, with heavy taxation and labor troubles, contributed to the depression and until quite recently few newspapers were making much if any profit. Before I paid my visit to the United States there was a slight improvement, which is being maintained. We shall not see substantial recovery until our taxation is lowered.

"Much of the money which should be available as capital to finance industry is going in taxes, and the general insecurity and uncertainty induced many to invest in gilt-edged stocks.

"We are hoping for better times in 1923. I trust, by the way, that you will be able to hold your advertising convention in London in 1924. Your advertising men will be made very welcome. It will be a year full of big events in England, including the British Empire Exhibition.

"Your chief papers are not only big but good. I always knew that they gave a great deal of European news, but the daily study of them while in America brought it home to me more.

"They give more attention to Europe than our papers do to America. I do not think they give too much; I think we give too little. As a matter of fact, we know very little of each other through our newspapers. There would probably be less misunderstanding if more space were devoted to our respective activities, but as a practical newspaper man with an experience on the editorial side as well as on the business side, I realize the difficulties associated with expansion in that direction.

"There is only one other thing that I should like to say in conclusion. I have come in contact with among others a good many of your reporters. They have the reputation in our country of what shall I say—call it exaggeration. I give them unhesitatingly a clean bill of health so far as my experience is concerned. There are, I suppose, exceptions in every country, but all I can say is that if you have exceptions I did not meet them."

TEETH IN SECURITIES ACT

Missouri Bill Forbids Ads of Stocks Not Registered Under Law

One of the provisions of the new securities act introduced into the Missouri Legislature is that it is a violation of the act for newspapers, etc., to publish advertisements of securities that have not been registered in accordance with the law, or on which registration has been cancelled. The bill takes the place of the present blue sky law.

George G. Buckley, formerly president of the Crowell Publishing Company, has joined the general management of the Hearst newspapers in an executive capacity. The nature of his duties has not yet been determined.

ONE SUNDAY LACKING, BUT N. Y. DAILIES ALMOST SET NEW LINEAGE MARK

NEW YORK newspapers last month had the second largest January lineage of their history, despite the fact that the past month had only four Sunday issues against five in each of the preceding three years. This January's total was 14,110,200 lines, which was surpassed only by the 14,344,249 lines rolled up in the first month of 1920. The 1923 figure was 566,608 lines or 4 per cent ahead of the 1922 lineage. Gains were recorded by 12 of the 17 newspapers listed. Total pages printed increased from 13,704 pages last year to 14,492 this year, despite the loss of a Sunday issue. The increase of 788 pages, or 5.8 per cent, is largely accounted for in the totals of the Evening Journal and Evening World.

v Hahn, managing director of the National Association, who opened the meeting pointed out to the advertising managers that the space they buy belongs to the consumer—not to the store—and that they should use it in a way that will not detract from the value of the paper to the consumer. This, he said, meant that the advertising should not be dull.

Some of the alleged shortcomings of newspapers as media for department store advertising were explained in detail to the Advertising Group by Sam B. Anson, general manager of the Cleveland Shopping News, in outlining the reasons for the existence of that publication, the first of its kind and which has been published since October 15, 1921. He said the purpose of the Shopping News was not, at the time it started nor now, to beat down the advertising rates of the local papers. It was merely the desire on the part of Cleveland merchants to assure themselves of the maximum selling possibilities of their field which led to the establishment of the co-operative paper, Mr. Anson said. Likewise it was with the idea of saving a great deal of money which went into circulars, distributed at random, without producing results commensurate with the cost. All these objects and many others have been very satisfactorily attained, the speaker said.

Mr. Anson's report of the attainments of the Cleveland Shopping News was in part as follows:

"Although the newspapers will never believe it (and merchants and advertising managers who have written us for information concerning Shopping News have had the same notion at first) the Shopping News idea did not originate from a desire to club down newspaper rates. First, and foremost, primary and fundamental in the minds of the founders was the desire to reach the absolute maximum of distribution to the absolute maximum of selling possibilities.

"Whatever the individual may have thought of the newspaper rate situation was not considered by the group—it was newspaper distribution to homes that was chief in their minds, so far as discussion of the idea from the newspaper angle was concerned.

"Nothing was contemplated, or has ever come to pass, that savored at all of going into the newspaper business.

"From the beginning, also, the Shopping News conferees regarded as a consideration of major importance the opportunity that such a publication offered to demonstrate concretely to the Cleveland buying public that they firmly believed in and had been practicing the principles of truth in advertising that Better Business Commissions the country over are so valiantly fighting for.

"Here was an opportunity to pick and choose one's company. In such a joint publication the situation could be controlled by the earnest, honest advertisers. Thus it has come to pass that the Cleveland Shopping News from the very first issue (October 15, 1921) has enforced vigorously against the big fellows and the little fellows of its stockholder-advertisers, a code of advertising regulations that the most idealistic of advertising vigilantes takes off his hat to.

"In our salutatory announcement we outlined 'The Purposes a Shopping News Serves' as follows:

"'1. To promote the sales volume of the larger and what we were pleased to regard as the better downtown retail stores of Cleveland;

"'2. To give every householder in the metropolitan district of Cleveland an opportunity, once a week, to read the sales announcements of those stores, and be impressed to the point of buying from them;

"'3. To reduce the cost of retail distribution in Cleveland by increasing the volume of sales without a proportionate increase of cost of attracting that volume;

"'4. To present to Clevelanders a printed selling medium whose ideal was to become the example for the world of clean advertising.'

"In that same announcement we made it plain, as we have repeatedly emphasized since, that our talk of high purposes in advertising statement was not merely talk, but that the Better Business Commission of Cleveland would always be the traffic officer to keep us straight in our course with no left turns or right turns.

"We firmly believe that we have accomplished them all and even more.

"We know that Shopping News brings results because most of the merchandise offered in it appears in no other medium.

"Today 167,000 copies of Cleveland Shopping News are being delivered over a territory approximating 100 square miles in four elapsed hours, and the job is completed by 1 P. M. every Saturday. At first we distributed 174,000 copies, but we learned, as we progressed that some of our weekly distribution was a dead loss, no matter how efficiently it might be made, because it went into districts that were totally unproductive from a sales standpoint.

"We have had it burned into our consciousness that distribution of Shopping News is 99 44/100 per cent of the battle. We go on the theory that up to the point of actually throwing money away, we cannot spend too much for circulation. Chief among the agencies which have enabled Shopping News to accomplish its purpose are its 350 small-boy carriers, carefully selected in the first place, completely 'sold' from the standpoint of pride in their jobs and thoroughly trained. In our effort to promote regularity of delivery we have also endeavored to promote regularity of time of delivery.

"We have come to the point wherein we are so confident that we are getting 95 per cent efficiency in delivery of Shopping News that we are almost prepared to go to the sporting editor and post a bet to that effect, and invite the challenger to chose his own weapons, by way of the test he may select. We have applied repeatedly (and we continue to apply them) every test of efficiency that we can conceive of or that our advertisers can conceive of. Every time the result justifies the 95 per cent claim.

"Next in importance is the way the stockholder-advertisers of Cleveland Shopping News have stayed put—have played the game. If Shopping News is an example of the co-operation with which retail merchants work in other communities and nationally, they team along much better than any other group of business men that I have ever come into contact with. In Shopping News they have not set up high ideals and then lain awake nights trying to contrive means to get around them. For the sake of the common good they made sacrifices of pet policies in the beginning, and they have continued right along to sacrifice them.

"For instance, they have vested in me plenipotentiary powers as a censor. They have written into their advertising contracts, with each other a long list of 'must nots' and 'can nots,' and then to absolutely copper-rivet the contractual recognition of the powers of that censor, they had a clause written in to the effect that when in doubt the manager shall use his own judgment, and that his judgment, whether good or bad, is to rule supreme. Although we begin to print it 24 hours earlier, Shopping News stockholders get their papers when the householders get theirs—not before. The directors have no means of knowing what judgment I have made, good or bad, until the paper comes to hand, and then it is too late to correct errors in judgment.

"Until very recently, when such meetings have become subject to call of the chairman, our own Advertising Group—the advertising managers of the Shopping News stores—has been meeting once a week for the definite purpose of post-morteming the issue of the paper that happens to be current. These meetings are very definitely the advertising group's own meetings. The chairman leads in the gentle pastime of going through that issue with a fine-tooth comb, looking for infractions of advertising regulation and mistakes in judgment on my part. At his left sits the manager of the Better Business Commission, who plays just as leading a part in the autopsy.

"When violations have escaped our vigilance, or we have guessed wrong, we are told about it in no uncertain terms. At these meetings shoppers' reports of the Better Business Commission are read. No matter what the explanation that was made originally to the Better Business Commission by the store management, the advertising manager of the store, if present, is bluntly asked: 'How come?'

"Another point that should be made plain in this connection is that the advertising group has, and often exercises its vested right to disagree most violently with its bosses, and is thoroughly encouraged in the practice by the latter group. The advertising group constitutes 23 of my total 46 bosses.

"The intention and the effort to 'reduce cost of retail distribution, by bringing the buyer into more intimate contact with the seller,' has been patently a reality all along. The proportionately lower cost of creating such additional volume has been passed along to the customer. Buyers obviously give their very best to the problems of what they shall offer in Shopping News.

"Finally, as to the redemption of 'blue Monday,' just ask any downtown Cleveland merchant, regardless of whether he is a Shopping News advertiser.

"About 'the expense of conducting Shopping News'——

"Inasmuch as rate per column inch is always the pro-rating of all expenses of a given issue, it seems to me that the best way to handle this point is to do so in terms of rate.

"The inch rate for the 52 issues of our first fiscal year, in which the average number of copies distributed weekly was 166,770, was $2.30. For the 17 issues that we have printed to date in our second fiscal year, the average rate per inch has been $2.26. This works out as 1 35/100 cents per inch per thousand of circulation.

"We make a practice of adding a 10 per cent charge to our net rate for application to the fund we call our 'Stock Subscription Fund,' which is a surplus we have been accumulating from the beginning to take care of emergencies that might arise from such causes as a fire that might wipe out our printing contractor's plant and thus force us to expensive emergency action. Fortunately, there have been no such emergencies, and the fund reposes in bank. Each week it shows a healthy growth. Stockholders' equities in this fund are expressed to them at the end of each fiscal year in additional stock. Eventually the fund may be used for the installations of our own plant, if we are convinced that such a step is economically wise.

"As to how our rate compares with newspaper rates—

"On a net basis (without the addition of the 10 per cent) our rate is a little over 40 per cent less than the highest newspaper rate, and a little over 17 per cent less than the lowest newspaper rate. While there is no justification for assuming that our 10 per cent charge is an expense, even with it added to our net rate the Shopping News rate is a little over 34 per cent less than the highest newspaper rate, and almost 9 per cent less than the lowest newspaper rate.

"We charge advertisers for engravings, which the Cleveland newspapers do not. However, we pool our engraving copy and thereby obtain a rate so low that if each advertiser were to devote all of his space to engraving, the total cost of his space would be over 27 per cent less than it would cost him in the newspaper having the highest rate, and more than 4 per cent less than the newspaper having the lowest rate.

"In justice to Shopping News, it should be explained that these comparisons are made on the basis of Cleveland newspaper rates with all discounts off.

"In round figures, the total cost of producing Shopping News is around $4,200 a week, or $213,400 a year. Of this, printing costs us approximately 70 per cent and office overhead 10 per cent.

"It costs us approximately one-half of one per cent per copy to distribute Shopping News. The carrier is paid approximately one-quarter of a cent. The remaining quarter cent is absorbed by supervision.

"I think that what has been done in Cleveland, in Los Angeles, in San Francisco, in Oakland and in Seattle, can be done in every other metropolitan city in the country. Furthermore, I think the performance can be duplicated in smaller towns of the county seat average population.

"The question of the existing newspaper rates is, as I have said, relatively unimportant. It should be a question merely of whether the merchants are desirous of reaching with their sales announcements the maximum number of readers. The fact that a Shopping News can be operated in the great majority of communities at a cost per inch per thousand that is less than newspaper rates is only incidental, after all. If it is the business that comes from distribution to the maximum of possibilities that is wanted, then, it seems to us, it is well worth while paying the equivalent of newspaper rates. Or better, if need be."

Discussing the subject of a Shopping News before the National Retail Secretaries Association, Harold N. Moore of Seattle explained how Seattle, following the example of other cities, put out a weekly paper, containing the advertising of 16 stores. He said it is in no sense a club on newspaper advertising rates, but it may sometimes restrain upward flights of rates beyond a reasonable limit.

"To be successful the idea of a shopping news must be sold all the way down the line to the last errand boy in the stores," Mr. Moore said. "I have heard of cases where advertising men were called in conference and told: 'Have you any suggestions about this matter? We start operations Thursday'; but that is the wrong way."

In starting such a paper, Mr. Moore recommended it not be put on an experimental basis because certain persons who only gave half-hearted support were likely to drop out. If a two-year contract were made the basis, they would put their shoulders behind it.

The paper must have the support of all the stores if it is to succeed, he declared. The front page specials must

ADVERTISING FORCES BAND TOGETHER TO MOVE MORE MERCHANDISE

States of Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas and Arkansas Represented at St. Louis Conference—J. H. Jones Heads New Organization

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 6.—The Move More Merchandise Association was organized here this afternoon as an outgrowth of the "Move More Merchandise" conference, which began here Tuesday as a feature of the Seventh District Conference of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, composed of advertising clubs in Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas and Arkansas. Merchants from all sections of the St. Louis trade territory were drawn here by the Merchandising Institute, which was part of the conference.

J. H. Jones, vice-president of the Ely & Walker Dry Goods Company, was elected president and Miss Ruth Sanders, formerly editor of the Drygoodsman and president of the Women's Advertising Club of St. Louis, secretary, of the Move More Merchandise Association, which will hold meetings here during the market seasons.

The Seventh District Association will meet next year in Kansas City. Adoption of changes in by-laws to conform to the by-laws of the A. A. C. W. and the organization of a department for club secretaries featured the closing sessions.

The institute consisted of practical talks by men of experience on better methods of advertising and selling, with a special appeal to merchants of the smaller towns. Here, also, demonstrations and instruction in window trimming, store decoration, and show-card writing were given.

A feature of the opening day of the conference was the wedding of Kansas City and St. Louis, the ceremony being performed by Gov. Hyde, with Mayor Cromwell of Kansas City giving the bride away and Mayor Kiel of St. Louis as best man. St. Louis was represented by a local man in costume while Miss Marion Kinman of the Kansas City Advertising Club was the bride.

The conference was opened by Walter B. Weisenburger, president of the Advertising Club of St. Louis, who turned the meeting over to R. W. Etter of Pine Bluff, Ark., seven district president.

Martin L. Pierce, research and promotion manager of the Hoover Suction Sweeper Company, said that the biggest menace that threatens the prosperity of the typical retail merchant is the mail order house and chain store. To meet this menace, he said, there must be a well-thought-out plan for co-ordination between manufacturer, jobber and retailer.

A. J. Wolfe, chief of the division of Commercial Law, United States Department of Commerce, said that advertising has reached the "moral stage, which requires that advertising, to be effective, must be believed." In foreign merchandising, he stressed the importance of understanding the persons dealt with and of selling service as well as merchandise.

John Sullivan, secretary of the Association of National Advertisers, speaking at Tuesday's session, held up some horrible examples in advertising. He pleaded for the application of the principles of individual selling to mass selling, of which advertising was but a part. He told of a concern that spent between $200,000 and $300,000 advertising in the national magazines in an effort to force consumer demand, but without success. He cited another concern that had a possible outlet of only 150 concerns that could use its product and yet used $250,000 in national magazines read by consumers who could not possibly buy the product.

The need of high-pressure selling was pointed out by George W. Hopkins, vice-president and general sales manager of the Columbia Graphophone Company. "To make a success in 1923, you must do something unusual in an unusual way. The time has come when a salesman must convey information, not display it," he said.

Frank Le Roy Blanchard, publicity director for Henry L. Doherty & Co., New York, said there is no better medium for reaching the local public than the daily or weekly newspapers of the town.

Fred Y. Presley, general manager of the committee on economic research, Harvard University, Cambridge, said that "the recovery of business which has been in progress since early 1922 rests upon a solid foundation. The fact that buying is still conservative and confined largely to current needs is not a reason for pessimism, but evidence of the healthful character of the movement for the last fourteen months."

Charles J. Crockett, sales manager of the American Corset Company, Detroit, said that the present relationship between the wholesaler and retailer was economically unsound. He predicted a greater death rate of wholesalers and retailers unless they work together on a better understanding.

The banquet was held last night with former Gov. S. R. McKelvie of Nebraska as the principal speaker. "Stop exploiting the farmer," he urged. "Quit misrepresenting him and misrepresenting to him. Tell him the truth. He asks no favors and wants none, but stands ready and willing to co-operate with the rest of the nation in the development of the necessities of life."

John H. De Wild, manager of the merchants' service department, Ely & Walker Dry Goods Company, said that retailers in their advertising should get themselves out of the picture. "Selling talk must be from the customer point of view and must be as personal as possible," he said. "Facts about merchandise presented in a natural, simple way are most effective."

George Frank Lord, director of advertising, Chevrolet Motor Company, Detroit, said that the automobile business was entering an era of scientific merchandising. The company figured that at its rate of production it would have to sell one automobile to every 210 persons. It did not merely expect to sell them or hope to sell them. It knew it was going to sell them.

Harry Tipper, manager automotive industries, New York, said that more effort must be put into marketing and that it must be made more efficient. A great deal more attention is needed to make advertising more attractive.

W. F. Gephart, vice-president of the First National Bank, St. Louis, and dean of the School of Commerce and Finance, Washington University, said that "one of the most common fallacies which is now prevalent, and which is of interest to the advertising man, is that connected with normal prices and normal business. From many sources, the inquiry is made as to when prices are to become normal; when they are to return to the pre-war of the 1913 level. There is no more reason why prices should return to the 1913 than to the 1912, 1914, or any other year level. As a matter of fact, neither prices nor business ever reached or maintained any particuiar level. There is no pre-war level. They are always changing."

KNOTT AGENCY DISCONTINUED

Fate of Newspaper Advertising Exponent Causes Much Speculation

Henry Knott, Inc., Boston advertising agency, has discontinued business. Its accounts, with the exception of the Waltham Watch Company (now handled by Frank Seaman, Inc.) have been taken over by Frank T. Day, Inc., a new firm incorporated January 31 by Frank T. Day of Newton, as president; Anna E. Martin of South Boston, treasurer, and Richard M. Walsh of Dorchester, clerk. Mr. Knott has become connected with the Red Book Magazine. The Day Agency has taken over the Knott Agency's offices at 739 Boylston street.

Mr. Knott drew the attention of the entire advertising world several months ago by publishing a brochure entitled "Paying the Piper" in which he flayed the "general publicity" type of advertising, in which results are guessed at, and drove home the value of using newspaper space. He voiced his opinion of magazine advertising in no uncertain terms. When Mr. Knott obtained the Waltham Watch advertising account, which had been run in magazines for years, he placed it almost entirely in newspapers.

Recently the account was transferred by the Waltham Company to Frank Seaman, Inc., of New York, which, rumors have it, intended placing it back again in the magazines.

The Seaman Agency is now making up a new list for the advertising. EDITOR & PUBLISHER asked it this week, on receipt of news of the Knott Agency's discontinuance, whether any newspapers were to be used. Its reply was: "Only one newspaper is scheduled for the Waltham campaign as yet."

The Periodical Publishers Association, through Phillips Wyman, its secretary, emphatically denied to EDITOR & PUBLISHER that there is any truth in reports that the Knott agency was forced out of business by withdrawal of magazine recognition in retaliation for his pro-newspaper advertising opinions.

The Waltham Watch Company declined to make any statement on the reasons for the transfer of its advertising from the Knott Agency.

The retirement of Mr. Knott from the agency business has aroused more interest in advertising circles, nationally, than probably any other happening of its kind in recent years. Mr. Knott has failed to reply to several requests made by EDITOR & PUBLISHER for a statement. He could not be reached in Boston or New York. The only information obtainable was that he is on the road on a business trip.

Chicago Tribune Adds $50,000 Each Year to Its Old Appropriation

E. W. Parsons, advertising manager of the Chicago Tribune, addressed the junior division of the New York Advertising Club, February 8, upon the work of selling space, and the relationship of the seller of space with the buyer of space. There were about 80 present. Mr. Parsons went into detail, dividing the advertising of a newspaper into three sections—classified, local and national.

He explained how the Tribune works in helping classified advertisers to amplify their advertisements, believing that such amplification helps to make sales, and at the same time increases the lineage.

He told how the advertising department maintains a service staff at the beck and call of local firms which have no advertising managers, helping them to make better-looking, and consequently better-paying advertisements. This may be done in cities like Chicago, where there is no local agency commission. Mr. Parsons explained, however, that the Tribune encourages advertisers to employ service agencies whenever possible, and that its own service department is used only when not to use it would mean the loss of business.

He said that the great growth of national or foreign advertising during the past ten years is due to three reasons:

First, advertisers get better results; second, the newspapers have gone to great trouble and expense in making market surveys and furnishing national advertisers with reliable and up-to-date statistics and data upon which to work; and third, because many of the wide-awake newspapers are selling own product by using their own pr that is, they are advertising for tising.

Speaking for the Chicago Tribun Parsons said that for the past years his newspaper has increased advertising appropriation $50,000 ally, and that, if it continues to proportion, the increase will in proportionately year by year.

Hard going, but a nice place to be these wintry New York days. Mrs. William Randolph Hearst goes for a stroll on the sands of Palm Beach.

It must have been a good year in the paper business. Everybody in attendance at the annual meeting of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, seemed happy. In the group below we have, from left to right:. P. B. PAPERS MADE PUBLIC CALL FOR ZONITE BEFORE TRADE KNEW IT EXISTED

New Disinfectant Introduced by Page Copy, Tracing Its Descent from War Surgery—Dealers Stocked on Consumers' Demands—33,000 Lines Used in 38 Days

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

A MANUFACTURER of motor oils opened up 140 new dealer accounts in a medium-size city a short time ago. His salesmen, under his instructions, "talked the advertising." They painted brilliant word pictures of the tide of customers which would start to surge in if the dealer would only stock the goods and sit back to wait for the newspaper advertising, being used for the first time, to get in its effects.

The dealers bought rather heavily. Nothing had been said to them in any detail concerning the selling points of the goods or what they themselves ought to do. While the newspaper advertising certainly did of its own weight stir up some sales, most of the dealers felt disappointed at the house, the line and themselves for overloading. When the manufacturer comes back over this territory, he is going to find the general reception to his men frosty, although right now his books show a good volume from this sector.

It is unfair to "pass the buck" to the newspaper advertising in a case like this. In a highly competitive field, where other heavily advertised brands had had the momentum of an early start, the advertising begun by the company for the first time without doubt accomplished invaluable missionary work, but could hardly be expected to let loose a riot of orders upon the dealer. In short, the advertising was oversold and the merchandise not sold to the dealer at all. Nor was the dealer shown the part he should play in moving the goods.

"Just how should we go about selling our advertising to the trade?" is a question virtually every manufacturer finds himself bumping up against, whether marketing a new product or a long-established one. EDITOR & PUBLISHER has had something to say on this subject before, and will have more in the future. Especially when a brand new and totally unknown article is to be launched by a company which yet has its reputation to build, is the decision as to best methods of approaching the trade difficult.

It is customary for the advertising to be spread before the prospective dealers in an effort to get them well stocked in advance of the newspaper campaign.

Recently, however, the Zonite Company of New York, and Atlanta, Ga., has demonstrated that reversing the usual rule is sometimes desirable. It has literally almost over-night, through the medium of dramatic newspaper advertising, boldly used, made a "reversing entry" in a test market, with remarkable sales results. This company promises to be one of the largest and most consistent users of newspaper space in the country in the next two years, its goal being a national sale.

During the world war, a young Franco-American surgeon, Dr. Carrel, and his associate, Dr. Dakin, of the Rockefeller Institute, perfected an antiseptic strong enough to kill germs, but against which the cells of the body could protect themselves. Given the name, Carrel-Dakin solution, this was used in the hospitals of the Allies with notable results in the treatment of infected wounds. The solution proved to be a thorough disinfectant, without, however, the caustic effects of chlorine; the chemical properties of the solution killed bacteria and at the same time had a solvent effect upon dead tissues. Deaths from wound infection were greatly cut down and some authorities termed the solution by the two physicians one of the most significant advances since the days of Lister.

A group of men led by G. F. Willis, former head of International Proprietaries, Inc., Atlanta, Ga., recognized in the solution an antiseptic which should be adapted to wide sale. (Mr. Willis is the man who built Tanlac to enormous proportions and made it one of the biggest medical newspaper advertisers.) Chemists co-operated in developing the Carrel-Dakin solution in concentrated, stabilized form which would be twice as powerful as pure carbolic acid and some forty times as powerful as peroxide of hydrogen, yet non-poisonous. The Zonite Company was formed and the solution in commercial form was named Zonite.

The company then was confronted with the problem of how most effectively to market its product. Through detailing and education to physicians and dentists, the officials of the company felt, a product like this could be gradually made to sell widely, but years would be required before anything like large volume could be attained. Therefore, it was decided that newspaper advertising would be called upon to place the article before the public.

Many months were devoted to perfecting the details of the advertising program in collaboration with H. K. McCann Company, New York. Because of the nature of the product and its origin, the company was convinced that the facts in the case ought to be given to the public in a dramatic and even a bold way. There were plenty of competitive antiseptics on the market; it would not do to follow beaten paths.

The opening piece of newspaper copy was laid out to occupy a full page, set in a decorative border. The headline asked, "Is there a greater war story than this?" The first three paragraphs were set in large type across five columns. The remainder of the long and detailed copy, with its occasional sub-heads, was set single-column width, occupying the rest of the page.

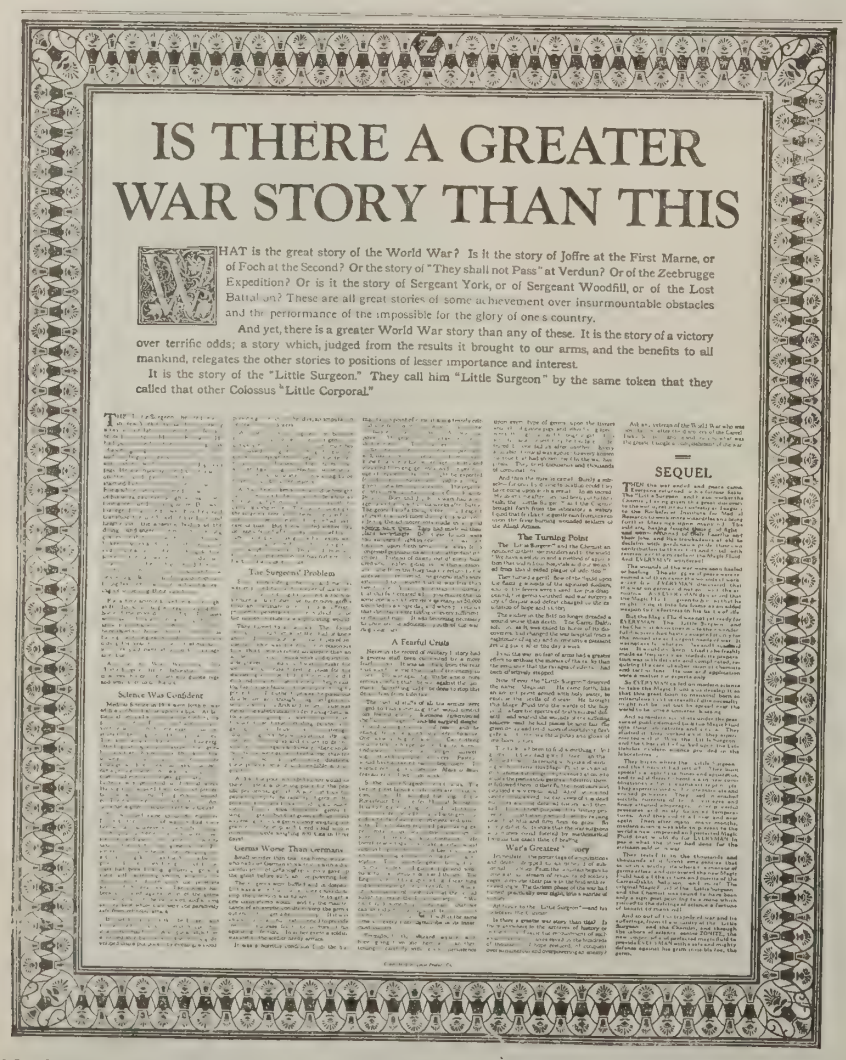
"What is the great story of the World War?" the advertisement queried. "Is it the story of Joffre at the First Marne, or of Foch at the second? Or the story of 'They shall not pass' at Verdun? Or of the Zeebrugge Expedition? Or is it the story of Sergeant York, or of Sergeant Woodfill, or of the Lost Battalion? These are all great stories of some achievement over insurmountable obstacles and the performance of the impossible for the glory of one's country.

"And yet, there is a greater War story than any of these. It is the story of a victory over terrific odds; a story which, judged from the results it brought to our arms, and the benefits to all mankind, relegates the other stories to positions of lesser importance and interest.

"It is the story of the 'Little Surgeon.' They call him 'Little Surgeon' by the same token that they called that other Colossus 'Little Corporal.'"

Then was related in detail the Carrel-Dakin story. It was shown that infection was a more dangerous foe to be than the Germans and instead of 9 of every hundred being dismissed in reasonable time from hospitals fully covered, less than 25 actually were in some operations as many as 3 were wounded in a day. How Carrel-Dakin worked out the solution and it did to make amputations and c drop to a sub-normal minimum wa lined. In the last column, unde small heading, "Sequel" was told had been done to bring about the tion for every-day use.

Nowhere did the name, Zonite, a in the large letters which would been expected. In fact, only in th paragraph of the long small-type was any direct mention of Zonite made. This said:



"And so out of the tragedy of and its sufferings, from the wizardr the 'Little Surgeon' and the Chemist through the labors of science, come nite, the new, improved and perf magic fluid to provide every man w safe and mighty offense against this invisible foe, the germ."

This was to be followed the second by large copy in news style feat Zonite itself and day after day striking copy in liberal space. From point on, it was arranged to feature name, with the sub-line, "The greate ALL Antiseptics," and the Zonite b

One piece of copy showed a dough with his hand on the shoulder of a cl ist, with the headline, "A Godsen Humanity that was born of the W War." The many uses for the pro were brought out in various adver ments. The public was warned ag poisonous antiseptics and "pleasant- ing or foaming disinfectants of dou germ-killing efficiency."

SEQUEL

The Zonite Company of New York and Atlanta, Ga., demonstrated with this copy that reversing the usual rule is sometimes desirable. Not a dealer in the city had ever heard of Zo when the page advertisement on the left appeared in the Boston daily newspapers. By the time the other two advertisements were published demand by the consumers for Zonite sent the dealers to their jobbers and successfully introduced the new product to the market.

First in Gain!

THE WORLD closed 1922 with a gain of 2,723,496 lines, the largest increase among the fourteen morning, evening and Sunday newspapers of New York, and 233,000 lines ahead of the gain of its nearest competitor.

That this gain is cumulative in character and therefore of well-defined value to the advertiser is indicated by the fact that THE WORLD enters the new year far ahead of its field in gains, as the following table indicates.

January Advertising, Morning Papers

Paper	Columns Gain	Columns Loss	World's Advantage
The World	732		———

The Herald		156	888
The Tribune		178	910
The News (Tabloid Picture Paper)	228		504

With more than three times the gain of its nearest competitor, THE WORLD'S gain was 70% of the net gain of the entire Morning Newspaper Field.

APPRAISE GLOBE STOCK AT $6,944 A SHARE

Small Profits of Newspaper Business Disclosed by Searles Appraisal— 3.9% on $2,884,725 Income Best Year's Record

The estate of Edward F. Searles, principal owner of the New York Globe, who died August 6, 1920, was appraised February 8, as that of a non-resident of New York, at $22,219,826, of which $21,288,539 was in personal property. The will gave the bulk of the estate to his friend and protegé, Arthur T. Walker.

Mr. Searles's New York estate included 108 shares of the Commercial Advertiser Association, publisher of the Globe and Commercial Advertiser, having a par value of $100 a share and appraised at $6,944 a share, a total of $750,000.

Elgin E. Rudd, who was secretary to Mr. Searles, submitted an affidavit concerning the stock of the Commercial Advertiser Association, pointing out that a deficit of $3,321,456 appearing in the balance sheets of the newspaper represented the difference between the assets and liabilities and that the figure of $3,754,372 appearing on the liabilities side represented the sum contributed by the stockholders from time to time to make good the annual deficits down to 1918. He said that the entire sum had been expended except as was represented in the assets of $617,135. Eliminating the deficit and paid-in-surplus, Mr. Rudd pointed out that the assets at the date of Mr. Searles's death were $432,915 in excess of the liabilities.

The balance sheet of August 6, 1920, listed assets of $617,135, which included $33,064 cash, $173,033 as the value of the advertising ledgers, $84,809 for paper on hand and $270,928 equipment and plant. The capital stock of the newspaper is $14,400.

The profit and loss sheets showed the following losses: 1914, income $1,043,761 and loss $128,597; 1915, income $1,322,440 and loss $75,837; 1916, income, $1,372,165, and loss $26,632; and 1917, income $1,435,341 and loss $12,764. In 1918 the newspaper first began to show a profit, which continued as follows: 1918, income $1,783,137, profit $39,029; 1919, income $2,586,473, profit $221,469; 1920, income $2,919,051, profit $98,771; 1921, income $2,884,725, and profit $112,964. For the first nine months of 1922 there was a profit of $47,551. The total dividends declared aggregate $201,600 and the remainder of the profits was retained as a working capital.

WILHITE IN BANKRUPTCY

Creditors Prepare to Sell Effects of Illinois Weekly Chain

The final chapter in the publishing venture of Fred T. Wilhite, head of the Star Publishing Company, was written this week when his creditors filed bankruptcy proceedings against him. The effects of the publishing company will be sold shortly. Publication of the papers was recently suspended. Wilhite, a Springfield newspaper man, about a year ago startled Central Illinois when he began publication of twelve weekly papers for twelve different towns in Sangamon county. All the papers were printed in Springfield. Outside pages were different for each but the inside pages were the same. Shortly after the enterprise was launched the Sangamon County Press Association openly declared war on Wilhite. Later he was indicted by a Federal grand jury for alleged violation of the postal laws. It was charged that he sent papers by mail representing them as destined for bona fide subscribers whereas they were to persons who had not ordered the papers and in many cases refused to accept them. The case was never brought to trial.

DUTY MUST BE PAID ON CROWN LAND WOOD

Treasury Department Issues Order Against Logs from New Brunswick—Holds Province Has Restricted Their Export

Orders have been issued by the Treasury Department authorizing customs agents on the Canadian border to collect tariff duties on the importation of logs of fir, spruce, cedar or western hemlock, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, cut from the crown lands of New Brunswick. Duties will not be imposed on similar timber cut from the private lands of the Province.

The decision of the Treasury Department to apply the provisions of Section 401 of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff to New Brunswick crown lands, exportations was formulated as the result of New Brunswick regulations which place specific restrictions on the exportation of crown land timber. The Canadian provisions which prompted the American retaliation follows:

"Every timber license or permit conferring authority to cut spruce or other soft wood, trees or timber, not being pine, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper on the ungranted lands of the Crown shall contain and be subject to the condition that all such timber cut under the authority or permission of such license or permit shall be manufactured in Canada; that is to say, into merchantable pulp and paper, or into sawn lumber, woodenware utensils or other articles of commerce and merchandise."

The American ruling, contained in Treasury Decision No. 39413, says:

"The department is of the opinion that this provision constitutes a restriction upon the exportation of logs of fir, spruce, cedar or western hemlock, cut from the ungranted Crown lands in the Province of New Brunswick. Collectors are, therefore, hereby instructed to assess duty under paragraph 401 of the tariff act of 1922 on such logs when imported from that Province until otherwise ordered."

At the same time the department announced that it was satisfied that at no time during the 12 months immediately preceding the tariff act of 1922 has the Province of New Brunswick maintained any "embargo, prohibition or other restriction" on logs cut from the private lands of the Province. Collectors, therefore, were instructed to admit such logs free of duty.

CRESSON LOSES AGAIN ON APPEAL

Texas Court Holds That Ft. Worth Star-Telegram's Report of Bergdoll Investigation Did Not Libel Him

FORT WORTH, Tex., Feb. 4.—The Fourth Court of Civil Appeals, sitting at San Antonio last week, affirmed the decision of the trial court regarding damages in the case of Col. C. C. Cresson vs. the Wortham-Carter Publishing Company, publisher of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. The trial jury returned a verdict that while the Star-Telegram's article on Col. Cresson's actions was not a fair, true or impartial report, the plaintiff was entitled to neither actual nor exemplary damages.

Col. Gresson was one of three army officers mentioned in the report of the House sub-committee which investigated the escape of Grover C. Bergdoll, the draft dodger. This report accused these three officers of complicity in Bergdoll's flight. Col. Cresson filed suit against the Associated Press and some 700 newspapers in all parts of the country, but the only suit brought to trial has been that against the Star-Telegram.

Col. Cresson alleged in his suit that the majority report of the committee did not accuse him of conspiracy in the plot to free Bergdoll, but merely excoriated him for the manner in which he had prosecuted Col. Hunt, who was tried by court-martial for disobedience of orders and failure to prevent Bergdoll's escape.

The suit against the Star-Telegram was tried at San Antonio, the j Col. Cresson, last June, and his a appealed from the decision of t court.

In its opinion, handed down b Justice Ely, the Appelate Cou that the newspaper article was a f and impartial account of the co majority report and further, tha not nearly so severe in regard Cresson as the report itself, inas several strong passages of the offi port were not even carried in th paper article. It also holds that cial report did accuse Col. Cre complicity in the escape of Berg that the report links together t spiracy to bring about Bergdoll's and the acquittal of those acc bringing it about, and nowhere ma distinction between the two. Th ion holds that the report names th as parties to the conspiracy and th is no escape from the fact that port meant and intended to identi three as parties to the conspiracy.

Justice Ely also holds that th lines of the article naming thes officers as parties to the conspira justified and further that the tria with propriety, could have instr verdict for the defendant when t was called for trial.

CHICAGO WARDS SEEK NEW ALDERMEN THROUGH WANT-AD COLUMNS

Believe Wider Selection Means Better Candidates—St. Louis Bars Camouflaged Dealer Ads—Milwaukee Editor Calls Want Ads the "Human Nature" Page

By C. L. PERKINS

Executive Secretary, Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers

THE leading editorial in a recent issue of the Milwaukee Sentinel is an excellent piece of promotion matter for want-ads. The editorial as follows is an example of co-operation between editorial and advertising offices which more newspapers could cultivate with advantage to their cash drawers.

THE HUMAN NATURE PAGE

Editorials are generally regarded as the highbrow of the daily paper. Want-ads the human nature.

Do you ever read the want-ad page?. Not in a hunting way as if you needed the job or the article for sale or the service or the several and many things offered at various degrees of a bargain.

In that page, generally set in the back part of the paper, far from the much desired "front page," in small type without the big headlines so generously used to set forth the striking things in the day's news, the want-ad page carries little of the thrill of the Ruhr occupation, or the danger of the war in the Near East, nothing of the tragedy of life as lived in the great centers of sensationalism, nor concerns itself with the words of full voiced senators nor of disagreements between preachers.

Yet in that small type there is humor and pathos and need and desire. Now, knee deep in January as we are, an advertiser would clean our furnaces, a human service surely; a missing woman is sought by friends; in one group we are told that various persons would clean chimneys, move furniture, do kodak printing, lay bricks, or plaster walls, nurse home cases, do upholstery—each a needed service, but odd in combination. Boys and executives are asked for side by side, and oh, yes, there is a second-hand car sale. And another and another, and another, and we lost the count.

A mother seeks her boy, and five firms have horses for sale—in this auto age. Also P. X. asks A. B. to please write.

So it goes. On that page all phases of human nature finds place and much good business besides. The "piano for sale by a lady with carved legs" no longer appears, because there is a classified editor these days, but there is much humor, and pathos, and—yes, just life, human nature as it is lived—on the want-ad page.

THE writer has often expressed the opinion that want-ads could be used to satisfy almost any want. To prove it many unusual uses of want-ads have been noted from time to time in these articles in EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Here's another new and unusual use of a want-ad:

Aldermanic candidates wanted in wards 7, 8, 10, 15, 16, 21, 23, 33, 34, and 50. Groups of citizens are asking voters living in these wards to suggest aldermanic candidates. The list of candidates in some of these wards is large, but citizens feel that a broadcast appeal might improve the quality of aldermanic timber. Mail suggestions to DP427, Tribune.

The above advertisement appeared in the Chicago Tribune's classified section Sunday, January 21.

They say everybody has a chance of being President. Then why not have all ambitious mothers teach their sons to watch for the chance by reading the want-ads daily?

THE Atlantic City (N. J.) Gazette-Review has started a complete real estate classified department with Sigmund Linchis as advertising manager; John Hartnett, editor; Chester Maydole, solicitor, and Miss Lillian Moreton, in charge of service department.

TRUTH in advertising has taken another step forward, and this step has particular significance to classified advertising because the following ordinance, which became effective in St. Louis on January 4, is more frequently violated in the want-ad columns than elsewhere:

"Be it ordained by the city of St. Louis, as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, partnership, corporation, association, trust, or any employees thereof, engaged in the business of selling goods, wares, merchandise, securities, service, or real estate, to advertise the sale of the same unless it shall be stated in the advertisement of such sale, clearly and unequivocally, that said person advertising such sale of goods, wares, merchandise, securities or real estate is a dealer in the same; provided, however, that the advertisement of the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, securities, service or real estate in such form as make it plainly apparent therefrom that the person so advertising is actually engaged in the business of selling such goods, wares, merchandise, securities, service or real estate, as a business, shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the terms of this ordinance. Any person violating the provision of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $500 for each offense."

ONE of the abuses of the classified columns which destroy reader confidence in the printing in the Help Wanted columns of advertisements that are not seeking help. Some papers are so careless that half the advertisements under the Help Wanted classification, openly and otherwise, offer to sell the reader some commodity or course of instruction. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram aims to keep its Help Wanted columns free from advertisements not advertising bona-fide positions and is promoting this fact. In a recent issue it had a three-column display advertisement which in part said:

"Star-Telegram 'Help Wanted' ads are dedicated to those of our readers who are seeking honest employment, paying a bona fide salary, or a reasonable commission. We do not open these columns to advertisers who desire to sell something to those of our readers who are without employment.

"Every day misleading 'Help Wanted' ads are rejected by the Star-Telegram that are scheduled by the advertisements for insertion under our 'Help Wanted' classifications, because we have reason to believe that the advertiser is attempting to capitalize the condition of unemployment in which some of our readers may find themselves."

THE Independence (Mo.) Examiner recently conducted a "Want-ad Week" with success. Frank R. Rucker, advertising manager, says:

"We spent ten days previous to 'want-ad week' in advertising it to our readers. In every way possible we acquainted the public with the value of want-ads, the opprtunities they offer, the interesting reading they afford, etc. We used newspaper space, direct by mail and picture slides. We told of the results advertisers had received in the past. We told them to watch the columns during ad week' for special offerings. T went after our prospective adve Just as the merchants make specia for their sales, we made a speci of six insertions for the price during 'want-ad week.' This cause two and three-time advertisers to full week's run. The motor car came across with fine lists of use the real estate men increased their and dealers in poultry and eggs in from the country. On the fir of 'want-ad week' we set twice th number of want-ads and came ou the largest classified section we ha run. The days following ran ah the usual day's business."

FARMER BEST ADVERTISING PROSPE FOR COUNTRY PAPER OF FUTURE

He Will Use Newspapers for His Business Rather Than S and Handbills, Wisconsin Editors Are Told at Short Cour With Their Annual Meeting at Madison

(By Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

MADISON, Wis., Feb. 6.—A newspaper short course was given by the course in journalism of the University of Wisconsin as a part of the winter meeting of the Wisconsin Press Association here, February 1-3. Fifty-two editors attended. The short course consisted of three classes a day in which problems dealt with in the regular work of the Wisconsin course were condensed and presented by the journalism faculty.

Combined with the newspaper short course was a farmers' short course given by the Wisconsin College of Agriculture in which farmers and editors were brought together for a discussion of the problems of farm advertising and the merchandising of farm products. A third feature of the Press Association program was a series of business meetings in which editors discussed practical problems of publishing in a small town.

In the editors' short course emphasis was placed on news service and advertising service based on the interests and needs of the newspaper's entire community. The development of local and rural news sources was offered as the best means of building and holding circulation.

"The average Wisconsin weekly newspaper is read by more people on the farm than in the town, in some cases from 60 to 70 per cent of the circulation being among farmers," Prof. Grant M. Hyde, acting director of the Wisconsin course in journalism, told the editors. "The news should appeal to both farmer and townsman wherever possible. Don't be satisfied with the personal item, 'Sam Banks began work on a new barn last week.' Write a story about the kind of barn Banks is building, how long Banks has owned his farm, what he raises. You'll have the townspeople reading to find out whether Banks is a prospect for insurance, lumber, hardware, paint.

"Nine times out of ten there's a story back of the personal item if you go after it. It isn't enough to say, 'Henry Jones has bought three registered Holstein cows?' Get a story from Hank. It is worth a couple of sticks under a news head. Tell why he bought registered cows, why Holsteins, where he got his cows, who he is, how long he has lived in these parts. It would pay to put in an extra phone and hire a bright girl to ring up R. F. D. numbers, getting stories behind the most promising items in the letters from correspondents.

"Several Wisconsin editors have put their offices in charge of a bright young woman, thereby giving them time to rustle advertising, news and circulation.

"It is only by intense development of the local field that the smaller newspapers can survive. Whether they should the idea so far as to throw out na and state news is debatable. But certain that their greatest emp should be on what the city paper c supply—local news. We must cove home town so thoroughly that the town folks cannot get along witho even if they read half a dozen city papers and periodicals.

"The farmer is beginning to buy vertising space. When he gets the of using the newspaper rather than and handbills to advertise sales, proc auctions, stock, land, poultry, dairy uce, small fruits, garden truck, advertising will be small in compar But, of course, you'll have to show farmer how and why to do it. Y have to sell one prominent farmer and get him to set the pace."

The program of the newspaper course follows:

"New ideas in headline writing make-up," "Making the most of news sources, features and cuts," "V to tell the merchant in soliciting writing ads," "Circulation buildi "How to get the most out of rural sources," "What to tell the farmer a advertising rates," "Rate cards and tional advertising," "Hints in hand correspondents and their copy," "Wh good news writing," "What to do the editorial columns."

The essential problems and main p under each topic were outlined by fac members and mimeographed copies given to the editors at the beginnin each class period. These outlines, a aging about six typewritten pages e formed the basis of the class discus That plans are under way to publish entire set and distribute them to papers of the state.

Topics discussed in the agricult short course were: "Do Wisconsin fa ers need to advertise?" "Expanding f markets through advertising," "S Wisconsin dairymen have merchandi plans?"

The Press Association endorsed plan of the Country Newspapers, which serves as an agency to obtain tional advertising for country newspap The plan was presented by Herman

The association adopted a resolu asking the legislature to place the tribution of law supplements, printe the close of each session, on a busi basis.

John G. Kuypers, De Pere Jour Democrat, was re-elected presid Other officers are: Merlin Hull, Bl River Falls Farm News, vice-presid and Louis S. Zimmerman, Burling Standard-Democrat, secretary-treasur

LINCOLN KISSED A NEWSPAPER MAN WHO BORE GOOD NEWS FROM GRANT

Story Told by Henry E. Wing, Entitled "When Lincoln Kissed Me" Is Good Reading for February 12—Chicago News Puts Editorial Data on Tax Reform Into Booklet

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

Director of the Department of Journalism, New York University

FOR Lincoln's Birthday—day after tomorrow—there is no more appropriate book for the newspaper man to read than "When Lincoln Kissed Me." For some reason this little book has not received the attention it deserves. Lincoln bestowed the favor upon a war correspondent because of the news the latter brought to him from Grant.

During the Civil War, the author of "When Lincoln Kissed Me," Henry E. Wing, was a correspondent for the New York Tribune. After Grant had cut connections with Washington and started for Richmond, Wing left the army to get his stories through to the Tribune and to carry a personal message to Lincoln from Grant. His experiences read like a dime thriller of boyhood days. In reaching the extreme outposts of the army he was unable to put his story on the wires except through Government permission. For the use of the Government wire to send his story to the Tribune, he offered to tell Stanton where Grant was. Stanton ignored the offer but demanded immediate information about Grant. Wing then took the matter up with Lincoln who accepted the proposition on the condition that a resumé of the story be given to the Associated Press so that all newspapers might publish the news. Lincoln provided a special locomotive to bring Wing to Washington.

In this way Wing delivered Grant's personal message to Lincoln, which was, "Whatever happens there will be no turning back." Such news so overjoyed Lincoln that he kissed the correspondent. The title of the volume because of this event is appropriate.

The book contains so much about correspondence during the Civil War that it ought to be in every newspaper library. In board covers, it may be obtained from the Methodist Book Concern, Cincinnati, Ohio, for 35 cents.

THE Atlantic Monthly Press of Boston has published a series of pamphlets entitled "Atlantic Readings." All of the series are worth reading but the one entitled "The Basic Problem of Democracy" by Walter Lippmann of the New York World is of special interest to newspaper workers. Matters of interest mentioned in the pamphlet are: the mechanism of the news supply, the methods of reporting the Peace Conference, the several varieties of censorship in foreign correspondence, etc. The cost of the pamphlet is 15 cents.

A SERIES of booklets of practical value to editorial writers is being published by the Chicago Daily News. Booklet number three, entitled "Sound Tax Reform" reprints four articles describing tax systems and methods of improvement in revenue. The first article describes the tax system now in vogue; the second points out the tax methods that are faulty and explains the failures of certain reforms; the third deals with the income tax and compares it with the tax on property; the fourth criticizes the revenue system of Illinois.

A copy of this booklet on "Sound Tax Reform" may be obtained upon application to the Daily News.

MANY fine tributes have been paid to the influence of the country weekly. What the village paper means to its subscribers, however, has not been better expressed than by John Greenleaf Whittier in his poem "Snow-Bound." Any one who has lived in New England knows the isolation of the snow-bound farm house. But the monotony of the Whittier homestead was broken when,

At last the floundering carrier bore
The village paper to our door.

With what joy the village paper was perused is expressed a little later in the poem by Whittier, as follows:

Welcome to us its week-old news,
Its corner for the rustic Muse,
Its monthly gauge of snow and rain,
Its record, mingling in a breath
The wedding bell and dirge of death;
Jest, anecdote, and love-lorn tale,
The latest culprit sent to jail;
Its hue and cry of stolen and lost.
Its vendue sales and goods at cost,
And traffic calling loud for gain.
We felt the stir of hall and street,
Wide swung again our ice-locked door,
The pulse of life that round us beat;
The chill embargo of the snow
Was melted in the genial glow;
And all the world was ours once more!

AN editorial in The Christian Science Monitor for January 3, entitled "Critics and Reviewers," elucidated the difference between literary criticism and the book review. It pleads for more conscientious work on the part of the reviewer in his comment upon a book which represents months of toil on the part of the author.

THE Newspaper World of London is publishing a series of articles on Hints to Journalist Students by Men Who Know. These are extracts from lectures delivered to the students in the School of Journalism at the University of London. The sixth article of the series—published December 16—is full of suggestions about musical criticisms, offered by H. C. Colles, of The London Times. He believes that musical criticism would be more valuable if it paid less attention to interpreting musical events to experts and tried to make music more popular with the public by suggestive and untechnical criticism.

Quebec Judge So Rules When Advertiser Breaks Contract

Justice Rinfret, rendering judgment for the Montreal Standard Publishing Company, Ltd., in its suit against Sara Deeb, ruled that when an advertiser takes a contract for a certain amount of space, and only uses a part of it, he may be called upon to pay at current rates for what he used, instead of at the special contract rate, but cannot be held responsible for payment of the whole amount of the contract, whether used or not.

Sara Deeb had contracted to use 5,000 agate lines in the Standard during thirteen months, and to pay $650. She used 1,005 lines, and then went out of business. The Standard sued for $552, the balance of the amount of the contract, defendant having already paid $98.

Defendant contended that by failing to complete the contract, she was liable to pay only 20 cents per agate line for the space she had actually used. This contention was upheld by the court, and judgment given accordingly. The court added that if any doubt existed as to the interpretation of the advertising contract, that doubt must go in favor of defendant, because the contract was drafted by the petitioner.

long string of the really biggest stories that Mr. Wood has written during his fifty years of reporting, begin with the famous "Goodrich murder" in Brooklyn in March, 1873.

Several of the many reporters "broken in" by Mr. Wood have become famous in literature. Bennett Graham Burleigh, noted war correspondent, and the War Eagle of Kipling's "Light That Failed," was one of the reporters who helped Mr. Wood cover the Brooklyn Theater fire in 1876 in which many lives were lost.

Others who began newspaper work under the tutelage of Mr. Wood, are Herbert F. Gunnison, present publisher of the Eagle, John Langdon Heaton, poet and editorial writer, and Alexander Black, author of "The Great Desire" and other novels, and father of the picture play. He also introduced A. P. Langtry, present Secretary of State of Massachusetts, to the newspaper game and helped him get his first job as a reporter.

Much of Mr. Wood's time has been spent in a study of the police department and the science of police work. "I have often wondered," said Mr. Wood, "why newspapers periodically attack the police force instead of other city departments. Members of the police force are far above the average of municipal servants in faithfulness, heroism and honesty. Most of them do their duty, live decently, raise families and educate their children, and why they are stigmatized as ruffians, is a matter that I could never understand."

Mr. Wood took occasion to say a good word also for the police reporters in general. "The average police reporter," he chuckled, "is a pretty good fellow and I have met some of the most wholesome specimens in humanity among them."

In his day Mr. Wood has smoothed out the rough ways for many young reporters who did not "know the hang of things" well enough to handle certain stories.

The one thing he says that he has always tried to discourage in young reporters is the practice of "piping" a story.

"The reporter that tries to dress up a story with a feeble imagination always destroys somebody's confidence in newspaper stories, for there is someone who knows the truth of every thing that is printed," is his frequent advice to the beginner.

Mr. Wood took one vacation 45 years ago, but instead of going to Scotland he went over in Pennsylvania and was married. Mr. and Mrs. Wood, who live at 62 Cleveland street, Brooklyn, have three sons and a daughter. The eldest son is professor of mathematics, the second a practicing physician in Manhattan, the daughter editor of a commercial magazine. The youngest son is employed by the United States Steel Company.

NEWSPAPERS MADE PUBLIC CALL FOR ZONITE

nence. Especial stress was laid on the use of the antiseptic for pyorrhea.

The campaign was planned to occupy at its introductory stage 33,000 lines per paper. Since New England was selected to be the scene of the test effort, the campaign was to appear in all the eight Boston newspapers and numerous papers outside. Here, certainly, was something which even the case-hardened druggist would take notice of. Conditions were favorable for talking the product and advertising in advance of publication of copy and obtaining a widespread advance distribution.

Mr. Willis, president of the company, at this point and against the advice of friends, decided upon a "reversing entry" into the market. Instead of merchandising the product and the advertising in the usual fashion, he gave orders for the advertising to be released without any of the product being on sale at any store.

On a Monday the full-page institutional advertisement previously described appeared in all the Boston newspapers. The nature of the copy was so unusual that many read it to find it whether it was a plea for the starving Armenians or the announcement of a new magazine. People began to ask dealers for Zonite. Twenty druggists telephoned to their jobbers and the sales aid departments of the newspapers to find out what "That Zonite" was and where they could get it. As the second and succeeding copy guns were fired, druggists became more and more "het up" and sold on both the product and its sales possibilities.

With the commencement of the advertising, the Boston jobber, the Eastern Drug Company, given the wholesale exclusive rights, set 35 salesmen to work getting distribution with five special introductory deals. The breaking into the market backwards by the company had secured the interest of the trade to a large degree and accounts were opened rapidly. Within about two weeks, Greater Boston and many dealers outside had been stocked.

"Had we gone to the dealer before beginning our advertising, even with our large campaign, we would have found him somewhat indifferent," an official of the Zonite company stated. "Even if he had given us his order, he might have had the goods in stock three or four weeks before the campaign had opened and demand begun. That would have been a damper on his enthusiasm. Our best method of selling our advertising, we believed, was to make it get people to ask for our product.

"We felt it of great importance not only to have the druggist appreciate our advertising effort, but also the product and the Zonite Company. Therefore, we had eight men whose job was to call on druggists to tell them our story. The telling of this completely, we estimate, averages an hour and a half per druggist. These men have as their purpose making the dealer a solid believer in us and our product for all time.

"The regular taking of orders was handled by the sales force of our exclusive jobber, who has charge of jobbing and retail trade both. We plan to follow the plan of appointing an exclusive jobber in each section and gradually extend our advertising and distribution through the country."

In addition to the scheduled advertising, a full page reproducing a letter of Mayor James Curley of Boston, thanking the company for operating its tryout in New England, was used. A double-page spread was used in one paper to show the names of dealers secured. Elaborate window and store displays in colors were furnished dealers. A huge Zonite bottle in cardboard and window stickers of imitation charcoal hand-writing announcing a supply of the product had arrived were included.

A Zonite book of 36 pages, showing with text and pictures a large number of uses, was mailed to 172,000 women in Greater Boston whose names app in the telephone book by first-class from New York. Later this we other families. The book also wa tributed through dealers. Outdoo vertising was another factor. In tion, after the consumer adver swung under way a detailed and somely illustrated book, 12 by 15 i concerning the company, the produc the advertising was mailed, unde cent first class postage, to all deale

The Zonite Company was not pre to meet fully the demand which ma ized. It is extending its facilities, ever. In New England within abo weeks, approximately six carloa merchandise have been sold and ered. The company's main purp to build a large and permanent v nationally as rapidly as feasible.

In four weeks, the company had more than 100,000 bottles of Zon Boston alone and difficulty was e enced to get enough of the produc four days after the opening adver nearly 3,000 dollar bottles had bee tributed.

Over 60 per cent of the drug stocked the special deals made the first 30 days. Since then deal all parts of New England have the product. Three men openin Providence disposed of 10,000 bott first day. In Boston, the Tran Telegram, Post, morning and ev Globe, Herald and Traveler, Adv and American were used.

This is but the beginning of s work throughout the country secti section. Now that the opening lines have appeared in about 38 d space ranging from a page to that is smaller, consistent follow-up ad ing is appearing daily in territories there is distribution. The compan the stage set for turning loose its in New York at about the time th ticle will appear. Mr. Willi self is reputed to be one of the cou really rich men.

It took courage and capital to launch Zonite before the public pages, without a bottle on dealers' s But the results showed that what loudest to the dealer is actual d by consumers. If you can prove t that your product is wanted and for through newspaper advertisin becomes receptive to stocking it. times results come quickly, as i case, and again long, painstaking ging is necessary to get a product nized.

RETAILERS DEMAND MORE HOME CIRCULATION

be made interesting and of real value all the time, so that housewives will want to read it. The woman who buys must be so sold on the proposition that she will complain if the paper is not delivered and the salesperson must be so convinced of its merits that she must ask customers, "Did you get your Shopping News?"

Mr. Moore said his experience convinced him that a newspaper man is not the best manager for such a sheet. He has the newspaper outlook rather than the merchants' outlook, it was felt. In Seattle, Mr. Moore pointed out, the mistake was made of putting out the paper "cold." It would have been far better to interest the public by an extensive street car, motion picture slide and billboard campaign.

According to Mr. Moore, the Seattle Shopping News advertising rate is slightly lower than that of the local newspapers and its circulation somewhat higher and concentrated in the city. The rate is $1.64 an inch flat, no matter how much space is used. The circulation is 65,000, all in Seattle. There are 16 firms advertising in it.

The staff consists of a manager and an assistant. The printing is done by a printer and the distribution by contract. The paper goes out on a Saturday afternoon, quite late, for Monday's selling.

Although stores using the paper all use the advertising in the local newspapers, the experience of San Francisco and Los Angeles showed, Mr. Moore said, some had abandoned Sunday newspapers for Monday's selling.

In opening the National Retail Dry Goods Convention, President Jesse I. Straus of R. H. Macy & Co., said one of the outstanding accomplishments of the past year by the organization was effecting the repudiation of the charges that all the distributors were profiteering.

"Our vehement opposition to an American valuation clause or to any other form of extreme tariff rates, brought about, I believe, a series of attacks on all the distributors. They were charged with profiteering," said Mr. Straus. "The charge culminated in a Governmental investigation and a Governmental attack. The second can hardly have grown out of the first, for the investigation which took the form of an inquiry by a joint congressional committee into production and distribution, completely disproved the charges that had been made.

"It is the function of the N. R. D. G. A.," Mr. Straus said, "to study the science of distribution to combine legitimately on a constructive program, to combine legitimately in opposition to destructive attack, to labor for greater efficiency and less friction and waste, to disseminate information that will tend to clear up misunderstandings of our intentions, our efforts and our ideals for our institutions; to admit frankly that we are in business for profit, but that our ambitions soar above mere profit; that we are dependent for success as is no other type of business entity on the creation and perpetuation of good will in the several communities in which we operate, and that we have a realizing sense of our opportunities and obligations.

"In short we are in a fair field with no favor. We need friendly competition, and if we ask no governmental subsidies we demand governmental equity."

While he expressed the opinion that conditions warrant now looking ahead to a normal period of business prosperity in 1923, except for unknown and unknowable influences in Europe, President Straus sounded a warning of the danger of increased prices for manufactured products, disproportionate to whatever increase there may be in the price of farm products.

Considering the present economic situation in the light of other business cycles, Wesley C. Mitchell of the department of economics of Columbia University made the prediction that business men may look forward with a fair degree of confidence for a continued expansion of business for at least the next six or nine months.

The influence of advertising on women buyers was the subject of a most interesting and constructive talk before the advertising section by Mrs. Lulu E. Eckles, publicity director of A. Hamburger & Sons, Los Angeles. The facts and figures presented were based on a survey just completed by the Women's Advertising Club of Los Angeles. Mrs. Eckles said:

"Realizing the important fact that it is estimated 90% of the nation's buying is done by women and that millions of dollars are squandered every year in an effort to gain their attention, the Women's Advertising Club launched and completed an educational and co-operative campaign among the women of Southern California in an effort to determine their reactions to advertising as accurately as possible.

"It was decided the most direct method of reaching women was through their own channels—clubs, parent-teachers' associations and similar organizations. Accordingly, speakers from the club appeared before these various bodies, explained the aim of the campaign and distributed questionnaires to each woman present. The speaker always urged that each of these questions be considered thoughtfully and answered, in the space provided, carefully and honestly. The questionnaires were collected immediately after the adjournment.

"By this direct method, it was possible not only to determine the classes of persons reached but also to be assured that each question was answered by the individual without any coercion or influence from others. To get a fair average, all classes of women were appealed to, from the wealthy club woman and head of a household to the salaried woman and wage earner in moderate circumstances.

"So diverse were the classes of women covered—embracing, as they did, teachers, housewives, workers in factories, stores and offices, professional women and club supporters that it was deemed advisable to figure results on a basis of 1,000 returns. Consequently the thousand questionnaires from which the final statistics were deduced represent, as nearly as possible, an equal number of women from various walks of life. Thus they may be considered to represent the average buyer.

"The following information was obtained through the questionnaire on the basis of 1,000: (Under the caption 'Did not answer' are figured the failures to reply to that particular question, though all others may have been answered, proving an uncertainty of determination on any one point):

CLOTHING BUSINESS BRIGHTENS

New England Retailers' Association Optimistic Over 1923 Prospects

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 7.—The atmos-e of depression which has affected iness during the past year appears to ightening, according to reports made y at the annual convention of the England Retail Clothiers' Associa-

President F. A. Long, in his annual ess, declared:
"any retailers were unable to operate tably during the early months of the ; gradually increasing business ght them to a point where the final hs were moderately profitable. Per-the principal thing to be afraid of e present time is rising prices. The ng public is still showing a consider-indisposition to follow goods up, and ttitude of many retailers still shows nsiderable degree of caution. How-we find today optimism is the key-in American business. The feeling coming general that the worst is all d and we are well along on the road aterially better things. This under-sentiment of cheer in itself, is a good indication that business is going to be good for the coming year."

Julius C. Morse, national vice-president, in an address, reported that the present high prices of cloth will hold for the next two years, with slight variations either way, but certainly not to return to prices as low as a year ago. "There is no danger of a buyers' strike," he declared, "because the advance to the consumer for next year can be held down to a $5 bill on medium grade clothing."

BLAMES ADVERTISING WASTE

Iowa Clothiers Also Warned Against Carrying Too Varied Stocks

DES MOINES, Ia., Feb. 7.—Waste in advertising efficiency and retailers carrying too large a variety and brands of goods in stock were blamed for high distribution costs at the meeting here today of the Iowa Retail Clothiers' Association.

Sidney Anderson, congressman from Minnesota, and chairman of the joint congressional commission of the agricultural inquiry, said the average retailer carries too many brands, too many styles, and too many varieties. This wide selection is unnecessary. One of the largest stores in Chicago handles only one brand of knit goods, while he has found small retailers in the country selling six or eight different makes. The consumer's demand for expensive service, and the liberal way in which credit is granted, were listed as two prime factors in the retailer's increasing overhead.

Fred Volland, president of the National Association, cited the immense amounts of expensive dealer helps and lithographs that are sent to retailers by manufacturers, only to go into the waste paper press, as evidence of the waste in advertising. He urged the merchants to put their own personality into their advertising copy, and stressed the importance of personal letter campaigns.

IOWA

EXPLAINING THE 500,000 AUTOMOBILES

Iowa is gaining in wealth faster than in population. That is why its 2,404,021 people have over 500,000 automobiles or nearly as many as there are families.

Iowa has an average of one automobile to every fifth person.

During the past year Iowans spent over $30,000,000 for gasoline for their automobiles alone, and over $12,000,000 for gasoline for tractors and farm utility gas engines.

It is a pretty good thought to give the weight of your advertising to the territory that can buy the best, and where newspapers are read at home for the advertising as well as the telegraphic news.

Naturally the national advertiser who is alive and on the job will lose no time, but start after this business NOW.

FARM and FACTORY VALUES of Indiana's industrial efforts mount yearly to nearly two and one-half billion dollars from agriculture, mining and manufacturing.

Too many think of Indiana as an agricultural state without seeing the market here for goods used by factories, offices and city dwellers.

This state, ninth in point of population, has twelve cities with over 25,000 people—the highest native born population of all the States, over 92 per cent.

In any advertising campaign, Indiana must be considered as an important factor, worthy of your attention and pretty certain to return results.

Indiana's leading papers, listed below, can be of great aid in helping national advertisers to secure a firm foothold in this unusual State.

EDITORIAL

PROFESSIONAL SPIRIT ASCENDANT

JOURNALISTS are well along the road toward professional standing. They have progressed far in the past year. In every corner of the land, thoughts of editors are turned toward putting into concrete form the principles of truth and of service to the reader—and to no one else—that have been slowly evolved during the past half century, and especially during the past twenty years.

No better evidence is needed than the spontaneous efforts of numerous state editorial and publishing associations to codify the principles under which their members are operating and desire to operate. Ethical codes have been proposed in a number of widely scattered editorial communities, and in several have been adopted and published. It is understood that the American Society of Newspaper Editors, itself an evidence of the trend toward professional consciousness, is preparing a code of principles to which its members will subscribe and under which they will conduct their journals. The idea is in the air and has gained strength by its own sheer merit, without the assistance of organized propaganda and missionary work.

There is much yet to be done before journalism attains the full status as a profession. There is also a danger that the enthusiastic supporters of the code of ethics idea will draw their lines so stringently that either natural progress will be checked or their codes will drop into creeds of words without the spirit that compels observance.

Journalism, like every other human activity, moves with the years, and practices that 1923 applauds, or at least tolerates, may be as distasteful to 1943 as the vituperative journalism of eighty years ago is today. And journalism has reached its present estate not through rules laid down by editorial groups in council, but through the enterprise and clear minds of individuals who refused to follow the crowd. These two factors doom any code which is based on a series of "Thou shalt nots."

Nevertheless, it is well that editors are thinking in terms of journalism as a profession. It will reach that state gradually and by a succession of slow steps, each planted firmly on the foundation of what has gone before. Some day, possibly within the lifetime of present-day workers, newspaper men will be prepared to accept full responsibility before their families and their readers for every word that appears in their columns. Some day they will be able and willing to cast from their ranks forever those who offend against the canons of truth and good faith that are generally adopted. That is one goal.

Circulation and advertising will continue to receive the attention that has given them their wonderful impetus of the present century, and he would be rash who would predict the limit of their development. Equally rash is he who would now guess at the heights to which the ascendant professional spirit among American editorial men may lead not only the press, but the nation and the world.

BRING ON YOUR STATISTICIANS

THE Postal Department has more mysteries that we would like to see solved than what the joint postal commission of the House and Senate has done during its two years of life. Not the least important is the matter of present rates.

To send a copy of the cloth-bound volume of EDITOR & PUBLISHER INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK to Japan costs 19 cents and to send the same book only to San Francisco the cost is 36 cents. Of course, the one to Japan is carried at fourth class rates, but when the destination is only part way and within the confines of the United States, it is necessary to ship by parcel post because the weight wrapped is 38 ounces.

Under these same conditions it costs 20 cents to send one of these books to Chicago against the same 19 cents that it costs to send the same book to Japan, England, or any part of Canada.

We wonder how long it would take a Congressional commission to figure how much of a profit there is on the carriage of a package to Japan at 19 cents if there is a loss on carrying the same package to California at 36 cents?

AN AMERICAN'S CREED

COMPILED BY CHARLES W. MILLER
Vicksburg (Miss.) Herald

WOE be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of My pasture! saith the Lord. Am I a God at hand, saith the Lord, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the Lord. I have hear what the prophets said, that prophesy lies in my name, saying, I have dreamed, I have dreamed. How long shall this be in the heart of the prophets that prophesy lies? yea, they are prophets of the deceit of their own heart; which think to cause My people to forget My name by their dreams which they tell every man to his neighbour, as their fathers have forgotten My name for Baal.—(Jer. xxiii : I, 23-27). But woe unto you scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men : for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in.—(Matt. xxiii : 13.)

LINCOLN

LINCOLN is close enough to the present generation through the memory of men still living to give an intimacy that makes him and his deeds and words always applicable today.

Lincoln's life is a vein of pure gold that has enriched America for all time and there is no American who cannot profit greatly in patriotism by delving deep into it.

Ida M. Tarbell in "The Fortunate Boy," Collier's for February 10, makes a point about the boyhood of our great American that is usually lost, one worth our consideration in these days of unrest.

"The boy Lincoln did not read for forgetfulness. The book was not a sedative, a soporific for him. It did not take him out of Spencer County, Ind., but rather helped him to understand Spencer County. It interpreted to him the thing of which he and Thomas Lincoln and Nancy Hanks Lincoln, and all these neighbors and friends of theirs, were a part."

We need the teachings of Lincoln more today than ever before if the world is to be saved from greed. His greatest attribute was faith in his fellow man. It was that which saved a union divided by hate and separated by rivers of blood. Peace can come now as then only "with malice towards none, with charity for all."

Lincoln was a statesman from the people who dealt through the hearts of men and gave peace to a continent greater than Europe.

WHEN ONLY RESULTS COUNT

THE automobile manufacturers of America are at last recognizing advertising as a form of salesmanship instead of a means of expressing vanity and as a result they are buying newspaper space as never in the history of the business, and they are filling that space with brass-tack selling arguments.

Plain talk, dollars-and-cents argument and actual photographs have taken the place of the so-called works of art noted chiefly for their exaggerated magnificence, of a few years ago.

The present newspaper drive for sales which started with the New York Automobile Show is continuing throughout the country and as a result orders are already booked to keep the factories operating to capacity until past mid-Summer.

The automobile makers have learned their advertising lesson, namely, that newspaper space is the most economical form of modern salesmanship.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

WISCONSIN paid tribute to the power and dignity of the country editor on February 2 when the president of the University of Wisconsin "recognized" W. H. Bridgman of the Stanley Republican, for distinguished services to the state's agriculture.

W. H. Bridgman

For 15 years Wisconsin has been conferring these honorary "diplomas" upon residents and non-residents of the state. The four men honored with Mr. Bridgman brought the list up to 50 names.

Mr. Bridgman was born on a farm in La Fayette county, Wisconsin. He was graduated from the Hillsdale (Mich.) college and from the Oshkosh (Wis.) Normal school. After graduation he taught for a number of years, and then became superintendent of schools in Iron County, Wis. In 1896 he established a paper at Hurley, but gave it up after two years. He resigned his superintendency to accept the postmastership at Stanley, in Chippewa County.

At the same time he became managing editor of the Stanley Republican. For more than 25 years Bridgman has used his pen and his voice in moulding a mighty community. He has made the Stanley Republican a model country paper.

So appreciative are the readers of the Republican that almost spontaneously they planned to hold a banquet in May, 1921, in celebration of his 25th year as a moving spirit in the community.

Mr. Bridgman has always championed the cause of a higher agricultural education and a higher standard of agricultural citizenship. As a homemaker he is held in high esteem. One daughter was graduated from the University of Wisconsin and his oldest son is now a student there.

Tell Your Churches about the Orange Growers

Suppose each orange grower in California took an inch in the classified column to urge the eating of more oranges, or the purchase of his own brand—

They don't. They join their appropriations, take full pages in newspapers, sell more oranges than ever before and get a steady price for their entire crop every year.

Tell your churches about the orange growers. Show them the path of united effort to reach the entire community. Fill the vacant pews in every church with big space used jointly.

We have copy which is being used in this way in thirty or more communities. Ask the St. Cloud, Minn., Times, the Kokomo, Ind., Tribune, or Kansas City Kansan how they are getting money out of series No. 3 issued by this Department. There are 52 ads, and the cost is a trifle.

Better send for the proofs before you turn this page.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

De Blowitz Advice to Newspaper Men

POMONA, Cal., January 31, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I wonder how many newspapermen have ever read "My Memoirs," by Henri Stephan de Blowitz?

I ran across a reference to it in a magazine article and was surprised to find a copy of the book in the local library.

De Blowitz was Paris correspondent of the London Times in the latter part of the nineteenth century, and some of his experiences throw much light upon the difficulties encountered in getting news of international importance in those days. He covered the Congress of Berlin in 1878, and succeeded in getting a copy of the treaty, so that it could be published in the Times on the day that it was signed in Berlin. This was considered the greatest journalistic feat on record.

The relation between journalism and diplomacy is the theme all through the book, and one sees what a great influence a newspaperman can exert in shaping international relations. There is a bit of advice in one of the chapters which any newspaperman would do well to follow. It is this:

"When a man gives a correspondent an important piece of news, the latter should continue to remain with him for some time, but change the conversation, and not leave him until it has turned to something quite insignificant. If the correspondent take his departure abruptly, a flash of caution will burst upon his informant. He will reflect rapidly, and will beg the journalist not to repeat what he has said till he sees him again. The information would be lost, and the correspondent would suffer annoyance that might have been avoided if he had heard nothing. A newspaper has no use for confidential communications it cannot transmit to its readers."

LOWELL C. PRATT.

Accuracy in Statistical Stories

OKLAHOMA CITY, February 3, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: What is the most efficient way of securing accurate figures in newspaper stories?

I am very must interested in seeing a comprehensive discussion of this question by a Managing Editor, who has solved the problem.

I have found that few reporters have a "figure sense," and often make the paper ridiculous with the publication of statistical matter on coal production, oil production and like matter.

If some genius could rise up to make figure stories "fool proof," a great advance will have been recorded in American newspapers.

I have instructed my editors to assume that all statistics are wrong, and to double check them with library information before passing them for publication. In spite of this office rule, we continue to make ourselves ridiculous occasionally.

Should any obligation lie with the editorial department to read copy on a statistical story after it has been passed by the proof room?

To what extent should the proof desk be held responsible for exact copyholding and revising of figure material? Errors in figures fall into two classes. One, figures handled by writers who have no conception of the business they are talking about; Two, figures passed by the proof desk with copyholders mentally asleep.

I want to know the name of the newspaper that has solved the question of getting exact figure information before the public, and I want to know how he solved that problem.

WALTER M. HARRISON,
Managing Editor Oklahoma Publishing Company.

Lloyd George Said It

ST. LOUIS, February 6, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I wonder if it would not be worth while, for the sake of accuracy, to insert a correction of a slip I made in the article on secret treaties. In speaking of the sequence of peace discussion in the winter of 1917-18, I referred to the restatement of Allied war aims, "Jan. 10, 1918." This reference should have been to the war aims speech of Lloyd George, Jan. 5, 1918. The Allied statement was made a year earlier, and its proper date, Jan. 10, 1917, was given elsewhere in the article.

HUDSON, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: The International Year Book Number for 1923 is a super example of an effort in publishing approximating in result 100 per cent of the aim and intent of the publisher.

No other volume coming to the notice of the writer is so genuinely satisfactory or so completely indispensable.

We are having our year books permanently bound for we consider them invaluable volumes for reference; the older ones as historical data and information and the latest book as a source of up-to-the-minute information.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Permit me to send you my personal congratulations upon the 1923 International Year Book. It is by all odds, the best publication of the kind you have ever issued, and is far ahead in every way of any previous Year Book. It is hard to see how it could be improved upon.

Papers Should Stress Purchasing Power of Territory

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Jan. 10, 1923

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: For some unaccountable reason or another the advertising agencies and advertisers are being inflicted again with an epidemic of lineage comparisons which, according to other advertising agency men and sensible advertisers with which the writer has come in contact in his many years' experience in the advertising and advertising agency fields, it is agreed that we all know that a lot of very good papers resort to merchandising pages, special editions and all sorts of things and occasions, from the opening of a new store, hotel, convention, food show, automobile show or other event to increase its tonnage regardless of the character of the advertiser or the copy or product used.

Then the first thing you know, advertisers and advertising agencies are flooded with an avalanche of comparisons of lineage.

Just the other day the writer in endeavoring to persuade a big national advertiser, the president of the concern, to use a certain paper, was met with an emphatic statement that he would do nothing of the kind for the reason that it was about the only argument that publication had put up to him in five years for advertising his products therein.

"Any publication," he declared, "that carries as much advertising as this claims it carries over and above its nearest competitor, has too d..... much advertising for me to have any show therein—or failing that, it is making its advertising the dominant thing, which is not the main thing for which a reader buys a paper or magazine."

And that, gentlemen, is the attitude of practically every advertiser with whom the writer has discussed the subject.

The writer wishes that some of our good newspapers who persist in this sort of thing would do what some other newspapers are going, viz: tell us about the purchasing power of their respective territories, the character of their circulation and a complete statement thereof—city, suburban, state agencies and R. F. D. mail. All such information as this is placed in the files of every advertising agency which is working in the interests of its clients and by sensible advertisers who are ever on the lookout for information that will enable them intelligently and economically to do their advertising in a given territory.

The writer is a constant reader and a great admirer of EDITOR & PUBLISHER and the many good things for publishers that it is continually covering so wonderfully well. But he certainly would like to see more stress on this subject than is at present placed thereon.

He also would appreciate hearing direct from any publisher with any good reason he might have to offer in justification of lineage statements and comparisons as a good sales argument either to an advertiser or advertising agency.

President, Thomas E. Basham Company.

The Merchants' Advertising Committee of Paterson, N. J., recently raised approximately $37,000 at a meeting held at the Chamber of Commerce. This amount is only one-third of $100,000 to be raised by the committee for advertising the City of Paterson over a period of three years. This campaign will include a comprehensive newspaper campaign, some use of billboards, and some direct-by-mail material.

DOLLAR PULLERS

Advertising and circulation managers are always on the lookout for new ideas that will increase advertising receipts and win new circulation. Your idea for increasing advertising or circulation may not appeal to your manager, but it may be just the thing that some other manager wants. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each idea printed under this head. The fact that the idea is now being used in your city does not bar it from the department. Address your communication to the DOLLAR PULLER EDITOR. When they appear clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable ideas will not be returned.

ABOUT two years ago I hit upon a scheme to get a little extra job work out of every sale and at the same time assist in making the sale a success through giving it more publicity. I wrote to all our correspondents in adjoining towns and offered them 5 cents for every resident's name tabulated in the following manner:

Jones, John H. m — * E A C
Brown, Wm. s — E

The above showed that John H. Jones was married, was a property owner, a farmer, used electricity, had an automobile and also had children under 12 years of age. Mr. Brown was single, a property owner but not a farmer, used electricity, but did not own an automobile.

For straight sales I suggested the use of the whole list and there has hardly been one sale since this list was established that has not used it. This means extra handbills in addition to the newspaper advertising. Distribution was made in a No. 8 one cent Government envelope.

This list was also available to a hardware dealer wishing to sell farming machinery, paint, etc., or to the dealer in electrical appliances or the garage man.

So far there has been some use for the list pretty nearly every month in the year, and it is an easy matter to get merchants to use printed matter furnished by their jobbers when you can show them a certified list.—C. N. F.

Get the artist on your paper to draw a full-page picture of a bird's eye view of a country-side, showing perhaps a road winding up around a hill, the farm, a good sized stream on the banks of which is a camp, trees, and in fact everything which would be seen from an airplane out in the country. Along the road, of course, would be found the billboard and on the many other things represented on the page a small space could be drawn in so that an advertisement could be inserted. The page could be sold in this way: on the space near the camp would be an ad concerning camping needs and fishermen's supplies, on the billboards could be practically anything, on the windmill on the farm the hardware man, on the barn the lumberman, in the yard of the farm house could be one of the seedsmen advertising bluegrass and so on all over the page, small spaces could be sold.—J. W. H.

A page featuring a calendar of the approaching month is good to run towards the end of the dying month. Fill in extra spaces with the moon changes. Then sell an ad for each day. Sundays are good days for church or amusements ads, Mondays for laundries and dry cleaners, Thursdays for fish stories, Fridays for groceries, etc. Every day in the month will be especially attractive for someone. This feature will appeal to non-advertisers because they more or less know of the advertising value of calendars.—R. B. M.

Now that spring costumes are in the minds of many women it would be a good idea for the paper to co-operate with the leading department stores of the city in having attractive salesgirls photographed in new spring apparel and in them publishing the photos with the names and addresses of the girls doing the posing. The paper might use the photos in the center of a double page spread and might, in addition to the names and addresses of the models give the names of the stores furnishing the costumes, and the paper might then group ads around these photos from all of the stores co-operating in the event. Over the spread there might be this heading "THE DAILY NEWS STYLE SHOW," or whatever the name of the paper is.—F. H. W.

Most financial institutions nowadays have bond departments which sell stocks and bonds to investors. There are such departments, probably, in the financial institutions in your city. To how many people do these departments sell stocks and bonds? Wouldn't it be greatly to the advantage of other local people to carefully invest their earnings in the conservative stocks and bonds dealt in by these departments? A story along these lines about the local financial institutions' stocks and bonds departments would be of great interest to folks and you could easily get the departments to use ads on the same page on which the story appeared.—F. H. W.

September and early February are good times to solicit the second-hand book stores for advertising in your paper. Many high school and college students purchase their books whenever available from these shops at the beginning of each semester. For a small fee they are glad to turn over their stock and exchange books. Try to sell them the idea of running a column of the books that they are arxious to dispose of at bargain prices and a column of the books for which there is a steady demand and for which they are seeking.—D. R.

"Where did you get the idea?" put to a clothing merchant who had just staged a successful merchandising stunt. The stunt was in co-operation with the local ice company. The latter had manufactured a large cake of ice with a straw hat inside it, also cards. This cake was placed on the sidewalk in front of the store, remaining there all day. The clothier contributed the hat, the ice company the ice. The clothier told me that the stunt had been proposed by an advertising solicitor of a local newspaper, who had sold the ice company on it. Both were advertisers, and the good will of both was increased by this gratuitous "service." Aren't there stunts you can propose to your advertisers which will help them, and draw the bonds of business relationship closer?—J. T. H.

Several Texas daily papers that have radio broadcasting stations, are getting splendid publicity by inviting musical organizations from small towns within their territory to come to the broadcasting stations and give concerts from time to time. The organizations are glad to do this for the publicity they receive for themselves, their schools, or their towns, and the papers operating the broadcasting stations get splendid notices from the local newspapers in the towns from which the musical clubs are invited. It is a fine publicity scheme for every one, including the radio dealers.—W. H. M.

Have some envelopes printed with the return card of your paper in the corner, together with a terse argument in favor of your paper as an advertising medium and business getter. Send them out empty under special delivery postage to a list of business men who should be using your columns but are not. It is likely that you'll hear from some of them by phone or otherwise, because it will be evident that you intended to send them something of importance and in some manner failed to do so. When you get a response send a good talker around to tell them what might have been in the envelope. at the very least you've driven home the argument printed on the envelope.—D. H. T.

The Fox store of San Antonio, dealing in photographic supplies and gift goods, cashed in on the public interest in M. Coue's theories recently by running a big ad headed: "Auto Suggestion." In smaller type below this big headline appeared: "Commercial Version by Fox's." Twenty-five boxes were grouped under the head, and in each box there was a "Suggestion" concerning some line of articles handled in the store. The Fox firm claims to do more kodak finishing than any other firm in the world, their business coming from many foreign countries and other states as well as Texas. Their success is due largely to advertising, and I have noted that they never miss an opportunity to make their advertising timely.—J. T.

The usual appropriation set aside by Congress for the free distribution of seeds for this year failed to pass the house and senate this year. Thousands of people all over the United States will fail to get these packages of free seeds this season. In a very short time now it wouldn't be a bad idea to mention this fact to your seedsmen in your town, and get him to use a goodly amount of space in your paper. These people who have been depending on the government for seeds are so accustomed to their own garden that they will not go without their home grown vegetables this year.—J. W. H.

Why not take advantage of every opportunity to tie up local advertising with local news? The day following a fire in Dallas, Texas, the Dallas Morning News used a picture of the burning building for a page center around which were grouped advertisements of local fire insurance firms. An automobile wreck could be used the same way for automobile and accident insurance. In fact, there are many news stories that make good money pullers.—W. H. M.

The first of May is known as the "renters annual exodus" among moving and storage men. With this in mind have one of the clever men on your staff write a humorous story about moving day, to be used in the latter part of April, and then go after advertising from moving and storage men and from furniture dealers, wall paperers, and so on.—D. R.

NEW OVERTIME RULING BY JUDGE HAND

New York Publishers Now Required to Warn Pressmen of Overtime, "When Ascertainable" and "So Far as Possible"

Pressmen's demands that the New York newspaper publishers give them a week's notice of all shifts and of all overtime to be worked during the ensuing week were ruled upon February 3 by U. S. Judge Hand, whose recent decision as arbitrator had been interpreted by the union as compelling the publishers to give such notice. His own interpretation of his decision rendered on December 18, follows:

"Notice of the starting time of any regular shift shall be given in advance, each Saturday for the ensuing week, and the finishing time of each shift; the fact that overtime will be demanded, when ascertainable, and the length of such overtime, so far as practicable."

Judge Hand was asked to interpret his former ruling by the joint standing committee of the publishers association and the union, the latter requesting the step after the publishers had refused to accept its idea of Judge Hand's meaning. His interpretation is considered to uphold the contention of the publishers that the union demand was impossible to execute, and President David Simons of the union declared that the new ruling "means more trouble."

The publishers accepted the interpretation and this week posted the following notice in their plants:

"Press Room Schedule

"No change in the schedule of the past several weeks, except for unforeseen emergencies.

"All publishers reserve the right, upon due notice, to call men earlier under the contract, which provides for eight consecutive hours, exclusive of lunch time, either day or night.

"Additional overtime may be required to finish the presswork. The amount of such overtime, if any, is not now ascertainable.

"For the week beginning Sunday, February 11, and ending Sunday, February 18, as near as now ascertainable: (Schedule of crew shifts followed).

"Men may be dismissed earlier, when, in the judgment of the foreman, they are not needed."

DISCUSS CLOSER BONDS AMONG PRINTERS

Topics on Calendar of International Council Meeting—Arbitration Board of I. T. U. and A. N. P. A. Meets Next Week

Closer affiliation of the various printing trades unions under jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union will be discussed at a meeting of the board of governors of the International Allied Printing Trades Council in Indianapolis. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, will attend a dinner given by the board.

Conservatives among the printing union leaders are understood to be opposed to a plan for demanding concurrent wage contracts for all crafts in the industry so that agreements with employers would end on the same date. It is said the proposal, however, may be considered by the board. It has been discussed in other meetings of the board.

Officers of the following International unions are expected to participate in the conference: Typographical, pressmen, photo-engravers, bookbinders and stereotypers and electrotypers.

The International arbitration board of the Typographical Union and the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, is scheduled to meet at Indianapolis, February 14.

Job Scale Cut in Kansas City

Arbitration has settled the strike of Kansas City union job printers. Hours were cut from 48 to 44 a week, when hand men were reduced from $40.50 to $39, and machine men from $43 to $41.50 a week. The scale went into effect February 1.

THE Cheyenne (Wyo.) State Tribune is printing a questionnaire in asking for suggestions for bettering the paper in general. The questions run as follows:

What change, if any, would you suggest for the first page?

What suggestions for the second and third pages?

What suggestions have you for the fourth and fifth pages?

What changes would you make on the sixth, seventh and eight pages? Be specific in mentioning pages.

What special feature or department in the Tribune do you like best?

Do you read the continued story?

Which comic strip now running do you prefer?

What comic strip not now running would you like?

Do you like the colored supplement on Sunday? Is it worth while?

Please make some general suggestions.

Name some specific feature or improvement you would recommend.

What would you add to or omit from the Sunday Tribune?

Do you like lots of big heads and continued to other page stories on first page or smaller heads and fewer run-overs?

Make a frank criticism.—A. R. D.

The Milwaukee Leader is running a series of descriptions of Milwaukee, under the caption "Milwaukee—Yesterday and Today." These descriptions are supplemented with photographs. —J. A.

Have you ever interviewed the men in your city who sell out-of-town papers? Much human interest material can be gathered there. The happy pleasure seeker, the prosperous small-town man in the city on business, the home-sick lad who came to the city to make his fortune, and the girl who wishes she dared go home; all are pretty sure to try to buy their home paper. The newsdealer frequently gets a glimpse of these stories, and he is usually willing to talk.—C. E. L.

In nearly every county in every state frequent complaints are heard about the inefficiency of the rural school system and certainly it is nowhere just what the people expect of it. The Dallas News has undertaken to find out what is the matter with them and what is to be done about them in Texas. It has arranged for a series of articles by a leading Texas educator who will discuss fully, "What are the facts? Just what is the matter with the rural school? What are the causes? Can they be removed and how? Do the rural schools need more money? In what way? What else do they need?" Why cannot a paper in every county secure a similar series of articles from some well-known local educator? Since almost every one is interested in public schools, such articles would be eagerly read."—W. H. M.

Work up a feature to be run some day when the sidewalks are especially slippery. Show how the principle of owner's liability for injuries or damage caused by the maintenance of a dangerous piece of property dates back to 1491 B. C. when the children of Israel were told:

"And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man shall dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an ass shall fall therein;

"The owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them."—Exodus XXI: 33, 34.

Then quote the modern version, your city ordinance which requires that sidewalks be kept clean in winter and sprinkled with sand or ashes when the ice cannot be removed.—C. W. V. B.

How about a series of forward-looking articles, concerning Greater Opportunities in a Greater (name your state)? Have some of your outstanding public men write brief articles for you on what your state will be like fifty years hence, and what latent opportunities might be developed. Your United States Senators, Congressmen, Governor, and heads of your various state departments will no doubt oblige with brief articles concerning it. The main point is to stress the opportunities that now lie hidden and how best to develop them. A mighty good series of articles and one that will give your publication character and the mark of progressiveness.—W. A. M.

"Physicians' prescriptions are always written in Latin. This is a universal practice. A prescription written in France could easily be filled in the United States and vice versa. Newspaper editors and reporters should have a code for all the letters of the alphabet which sound alike, especially when sent over the telephone. This would eliminate mistakes made in initials of people when a report is sent in by a reporter to his paper. The letters A and J sound alike; B, C, D, E, G, P, T and V have like sounds; F and S are similar and often M and N are confused. Short one syllable words would be the easiest to use for the code, a set like the following could be used: A, ape; B, bag; C, call; D, dig; E, ever; F, fog; G, go; J, joy; M, must; N, nun; P, pot; S, sat; T, tin; V, van. If the letters Q and U should seem to be confusing, they could be added to the list and the words: Q, quit, and U, unit, would be suitable as code words. By making this list or any suitable list nation-wide, and put into use by all the newspapers, there is no doubt but that a great amount of unnecessary mistakes could be done away with and also reporters leaving one paper and going to another would use the same list and be familiar with it."—J. W. H.

The other day, in a burst of confidence, an acquaintance remarked to me, "I have wondered for fifteen years what the average bank cashier earned, and I've never found out. Can you tell me?" Everyone is interested in what the other fellow earns—and in the case of professional men and office workers, he usually has to guess at it and let it go at that. Assign a tactful and persistent reporter to investigate the question, "What do the lawyers of the city earn per year?" Let him get a range of yearly incomes, an average. Tell what percentage earn under $4,000 a year, and what percentage over; how much advice lawyers give for which they never get paid; how many more people are advised out of litigation than steered into it. Stories on the earnings of bank employees, office workers, salesmen, etc., would be equally interesting to readers. The whole could be presented as a portrayal for high school students and young people of the advantages of various occupations and professions. But be sure to give exact figures of earnings.—J. T. B.

It would be a novel and interesting stunt for the paper to stage a doll show in which prizes would be offered for the best dressed dolls, the oldest dolls, the funniest dolls, the most used dolls, the cutest doll houses and so on. The show could be staged in the paper's show window, and, of course, all the exhibits should carry the names and addresses of the people exhibiting them. Such a stunt as this would attract a great lot of attention and get many visitors to the paper's office, and so would help boost the paper quite materially.—F. H. W.

How many public clocks are there in your city? Why were they placed there and how long has there been a public clock in that particular location? Estimate how much they are used by the public; call some of the owners and find out how many times they are told about one which has stopped at some time. Does any organization or body depend solely upon such a timepiece? The street railway company does this in Topeka, the inspectors using the clock on the State Journal building. Along this line, call up a dozen or so people and ask them the time. Compare all these with the exact time of day. How many minutes difference is there in all the persons called? Did some of them keep their timepiece fast for a certain purpose? How many times a day do people call the telegraph office to get the hour? —J. W. H.

Has your city erected a memorial of any kind to its soldiers of the World War? Some places are building American Legion club houses, some are erecting libraries, some are building monuments, some are lining city streets or country roads with trees, some are putting tablets in public buildings, but many are as yet doing nothing to commemorate the soldiers. Why not hold a conference with the ex-soldiers, determine what is the best and most practical thing to do, and put your paper behind a memorial movement in such a way as to make it a quick success? Co-operation and work along this line will insure almost universal support.—W. H. M.

In the production of brass and hardware, boots and shoes, silverware and cutlery, silk and felt hats, textiles, clocks and many other lines New England far excels any other section of the country.

New England manufactures more clocks than any other section of the country. More than one-fourth of all men's felt hats are New England made. Over fifty per cent of all the brass made in the United States is produced in New England.

Despite competition in the textile group from other sections of the country, New England produces over one-third of the total for all the United States.

Eleven and a half per cent of all products made in the United States is manufactured in New England.

With these tremendous resources New England becomes a great buying power. Every day the families of New England spend millions of dollars.

Automotive accessory dealers and manufacturers realize the wonderful purchasing power of THE PRESS by using more advertising in this great paper than in either The News or Plain Dealer.

The following daily figures for the entire year of 1922 indicate the advertisers' preference in lines:

THE PRESS	98012	Lines
Plain Dealer	69215	"
The News	30066	"

Moreover, THE PRESS carries more automobile tire advertising than The News or Daily Plain Dealer. This is conclusive proof and evidence of the advertisers' faith in THE PRESS as Cleveland's greatest daily newspaper.

port of Wilson-Lawrenson Discloses Unusual Arrangements Under Way to Make "On to London" Movement Success

HE report of F. A. Wilson-Lawrenson to the special committee of the As- ated Advertising Clubs of the World pointed to consider the London invita- for the 1924 convention of that or- ization was released to EDITOR & PUB- HER by President Lou Holland this k.

Mr. Wilson-Lawrenson recently re- ned from England, where he went as representative of the committee, of ch he is chairman, to investigate and rt upon the prospects of a successful vention in case it is taken to that city. he other members of the special com- ee are A. G. Newmyer, R. C. Ayres, rge B. Sharpe, T. W. LeQuatte, F. Stewart, Homer J. Buckley, E. T. edith, J. P. Gilroy and Stanley gue.

Mr. Wilson-Lawrenson's report, in follows:

wish to render, in writing, a preliminary t on the result of my investigations in t Britain as to the desirability and feasi- of holding the 1924 Convention of the ciated Advertising Clubs of the World in lon, instead of in the United States.

ie initial invitation to hold the 1924 Conven- of the Associated Advertising Clubs of World in London was presented last year at Milwaukee convention by Sir Charles F. am, a leading advertising man of Great in, and London associate of the Wm. H. in Company of New York, who came over special envoy from the Thirty Club of lon. His invitation was endorsed by the aukee convention with the understanding if, after an investigation it was found a ssful convention could be handled in lon, suitable recommendation and backing d be presented to the Atlantic City con- on. The annual meeting of club presidents l unanimously in favor of London and by ing vote agreed to recommend "London '24" ie presidents' meeting in Atlantic City in . A committee was appointed to investi- the desirability of accepting the invitation, to report fully to President Holland of the A. C. of W. It was as chairman of that nittee that I visited England.

his will confirm what I reported to a num- of members of the committee at two meet- held recently in New York City. The bers of the committee who were present at two meetings were the following:

ie Hon. E. T. Meredith.
anley Clague.
mes P. Gilroy.
rl Hunt, ex-officio member.
sse H. Neal, ex-officio member.
A. Wilson-Lawrenson (the writer).

ere was also present at these meetings Sir les F. Higham, chairman of the London nittee.

ie report made at these two meetings was given to F. W. Stewart, Canadian member ne committee, on the occasion of my visit Montreal last week.

n my arrival in London, on December 27, , I was met by the president, treasurer and tary of the Thirty Club of London, and evening we had an informal discussion, at h time I outlined to these gentlemen the tion as I saw it from the United States e, which was in accordance with the thought ie committee after our several meetings.

ie next day, December 28th, I met the utive committee of the Thirty Club and the ention committee and I outlined to the com- ee, as a whole, the problems which the ed States was facing in considering this lon invitation I then projected before them, n alternative plan, the one which was ap- ed by our committee; namely, a World e Club Conference under the auspices of Thirty Club of London.

ey asked for a few days to consider the tion, and subsequently, I was invited to ier conference, at which time the committee med me that for reasons, which they satis- me were good and sufficient, they were un- to consider the alternative plan and pro- d to go ahead and press their original plan; ly, that the convention should be held in lon in 1924.

then informed them that I was not there to he convention, or to commit the Associated rtising Clubs in any way, but that in my city as chairman of the investigation com- e, it would be necessary for me to make port to my committee and to the Associated rtising Clubs of the World as to whether it feasible or desirable that the convention be held in London and that my report must be substantiated by facts.

On January 18th, I, as the chairman of this committee and representing the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, was tendered a dinner at the Hotel Trocadero, presided over by John Cheshire, general manager of Lever Brothers and president of the Thirty Club of London, and supported by the Hon, Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame, president of the Board of Trade, Sir Charles F. Higham, chairman of the London Committee, W. S. Crawford, British vice-president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World and vice-president of the Thirty Club of London, C. Harold Vernon, Hon. secretary of the Thirty Club of London, Lt. Col. E. F. Lawson of the Newspaper Proprietors' Association, M. J. Evelyn Wrench of the English Speaking Union, James Strong of the Association of British Advertising Agents, and Arthur Chadwick of the Incorporated Sales Managers' Association.

I am sending to each member of the committee a copy of the menu of the club dinner. This may be of interest and act as souvenir.

The following is an outline of the information which I asked for:

1. That the invitation, issued by the Thirty Club of London would of necessity have to be backed up by other interests in Breat Britain. What other interests had given their support? To this end, I not only wished information from them, but desired to meet with the leaders of industry, publishing, advertising, as well as Government leaders, so that I might make my own observations.

My investigation disclosed the following:

(a) That the Thirty Club of London is made up of leaders in publishing and advertising and constituted a body of men who have most unusual power and influence. I am frank to say that I have never seen a group of thirty men in one advertising unit before with such power or such influence.

The committee, appointed to work with me on this matter, was made up of the following gentlemen:

Sir Charles F. Higham—
Chairman of the committee.

John Cheshire—
President of the Thirty Club of London, and the general manager of Lever Brothers, directing their interests both in England and America.

J. C. Akerman—
Manager of The London Times.

W. S. Crawford—
Head of a large advertising agency and British vice-president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World; also vice-president of the Thirty Club of London.

Philip Emanuel—
Director of Advertising of a number of important publications including John Bull; also treasurer of the Thirty Club of London.

C. Harold Vernon—
Head of one of the largest advertising agencies in London, who is also secretary of the Thirty Club of London.

George Scott—
London Manager Glasgow Herald, which is the leading provincial paper.

Sydney Walton—
Journalist and propagandist. Responsible for Government propaganda.

U. B. Walmsley—
Of E. Hulton, Ltd., one of the largest publishing houses in Great Britain.

(b) That the following associations and clubs had been invited to associate themselves in this invitation and to be part of the general committee and had accepted the invitation:

The Weekly Newspaper and Periodical Proprietors.

Weekly Newspaper Proprietors' Association.
Northern Federation of Newspapers.
Aldwych Club.
Association of British Advertising Agents.
Audit Bureau.
Advertisement Consultants.
Advertisement Managers' Association.
Incorporated Society of British Advertisers.
Publicity Club.
Fleet Street Club.
Sales Managers' Association.
Trade & Technical Newspaper Association.
United Billposters' Association.
London Billposters' Association.
Association of Display Men.
Master Printers' Association.
Federation of Master Process Engravers.
Association of Retail Distributors.
Newspaper Society.
Scottish Newspaper Association.

(c) I personally interviewed a very large number of leaders in British industry and from one and all received not only their assurance of their hearty support, but a number of these men publicly expressed themselves through the columns of the British papers on the importance of holding the convention in London and promised their active and financial support.

(d) I interviewed the leading publishers of England, including the following:

Lord Rothermere, the owner of the Daily Mail, and a number of other papers, who has promised the support of his columns, and who, during the time I was in England, assigned one of his leading journalists to accompany me day by day and give my mission and the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World and its importance a column on the leader page right next to the French war news.

He has assured me that this is nothing to what his papers will do between now and the convention time, or what they will do at the time of the convention.

Lord Riddell, owner of another large group of papers, also gave my mission editorial support and has assured me that he will support the plan as soon as the decision has been made.

Sir Edward Houlton, owner of the sketch and other leading papers—head of one of the largest publishing companies in the country—ditto.

Lord Burnham, owner of the Telegraph and other daily papers—ditto.

Sir Ernest P. Benn, who practically controls the trade paper industry of Great Britain—ditto.

The publishers of papers such as the Yorkshire, Liverpool and other provincial papers—ditto.

The publisher of the Advertisers' Weekly has already given the best part of two issues on this convention matter and pledged his support. The same is true of the Advertisers' Monthly.

(e) Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame, President of the Board of Trade, which corresponds to the office held by Mr. Herbert Hoover in this country, pledged the support and interest of his department.

(f) In a half hour interview, Mr. Bonar Law, Prime Minister of England, authorized me to say to the committee and to the public generally, that the project has his very deep interest, both as a business man and as Premier of England, and that we may absolutely count to the limit of his personal interest and support of his Government.

Consequently, in answer to Question 1, projected to the committee, I am satisfied, after these interviews, and the interview with the associations mentioned as being invited to cooperate, that the invitation of the Thirty Club of London is backed up by all important interests in Great Britain, and if the convention should go to England, it will be England's affair and not only that of the Thirty Club of London.

(2) The suggested program and benefits which may result.

The program, as roughed out at the moment, will embrace all the usual trade and technical matters, but in addition will take up the following:

The working out of a code for the protection of national and international trade marks and patents.

International and Dominion distribution, shipping and banking.

Effect of foreign exchange on trade and selling.

Financial advertising.

Developing of chain store system; habits and differences of people in buying.

How forty-five million people are affected each morning by daily paper advertisements.

Effect of advertising on legislation.

British Newspaper production and distribution.

Advertising of combined trade organization.

The foregoing are simply the rough headings of a program which is now being worked out for presentation to the American association for consideration.

It is not the intention of the Thirty Club of London to handle the program. They wish to present a program to the American association and leave it to run the convention with such help as they may ask for from the British association.

It is my judgment, after careful consideration and thought, that the benefits to be derived from holding the convention in London are as follows:

A. A. C. W. IN LONDON FINDS HEARST'S FAVOR

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST will send fifteen of his newspaper executives to London in 1924, if the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World select that city for their convention. He informed Mr. Wilson-Lawrenson to that effect this week, adding that he will get behind the effort to make London next year's convention city.

AD CLUBS WILL MEET ON STEEL PIER

General Sessions, Exhibit, and Registration Over the Ocean, with Departmental Sessions at Boardwalk Hotels

The executive board of the national program committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in charge of the program for the Atlantic City convention has accepted the original suggestion of the Advertising Club of Atlantic City that the Steel Pier be used for general sessions, the advertising exhibit and registration headquarters.

There will be no "headquarters hotel" for the Atlantic City convention. Registrations will be held on the Steel Pier, and the departmental and conference meetings will be held in various hotel auditoriums and other meeting places, practically all of them on the boardwalk.

The convention will open on Sunday afternoon, June 3, with an inspirational meeting, and Monday and Thursday will be devoted to general sessions. On Tuesday and Wednesday, departmental and interdepartmental meetings will be held. The committee asked W. Frank McClure, of Chicago, chairman of the National Advertising Commission, to determine what portion of this time shall be devoted to the usual interdepartmental sessions.

One hour will be given at a Monday general session to a program pertaining to the advertising exhibits.

Three half days will be given to departmental and conference programs at the convention, and one half day to the interdepartmental session, in place of two half days, as has been the custom for several years. In addition to the general session of June 3 (the inspirational meeting), there will be general sessions all day Monday and all day Thursday. The departmental and interdepartmental sessions will be held on Tuesday and Wednesday.

W. Frank McClure, chairman of the National Advertising Commission, has suggested that half a dozen speakers be selected by the Commission for the half day interdepartmental session, and that subjects be assigned which will illustrate various kinds and types of advertising in various mediums.

The exhibit will be arranged at Atlantic City so that all delegates attending general sessions will pass it.

The Department of Commerce at Washington has given the exhibit committee co-operation in obtaining exhibits of overseas advertising.

The meeting of the executive board was attended by Rowe Stewart, Philadelphia; John H. Logeman, Chicago; Harry D. Robbins, New York; Albert T. Bell, Atlantic City, and Earle Pearson, secretary of the committee. Carl Hunt, manager of the A. A. C. W., also attended. In the absence of Chairman C. W. Woodbridge, Rowe Stewart presided.

The National Commission will meet at the Statler Hotel, Cleveland, April 24 and 25, and the Cleveland Advertising Club will co-operate in arranging the public sessions. The Commission will devote only a part of its time to executive sessions, and a program of interest to Cleveland business men, and to delegations from other nearby advertising clubs, will be arranged for the rest of the time.

Fake Subscription Takers Busy

Fake subscription solicitors working in Springfield, Ohio, are said to have mulcted several residents before their activities came to the attention of the police and the Springfield News, which they were "offering" at a "special" rate of $3 a year for daily and Sunday. The defrauders apparently got wind that their operations had been tipped off, for when investigation was started, they could not be located.

NEWSPAPERS SOLD WALTHAM WATCHES BUT BANK FORCED CHANGE

Company Bought $95,000 Worth of Newspaper Space in 1922, Plus $31,000 Invested by Local Dealers, With Traceable Results, but Fails to Exploit Its Success

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

REVENUE estimated at several hundred thousand dollars for 1923 will be lost to the newspapers in favor of the so-called "general mediums" as the result of the abandonment by the Waltham Watch Company, Waltham, Mass., of its policy of powerful concentrated local newspaper advertising.

What is behind this move? What are its causes? Did the newspapers fail to "come through" with results? Is this an indication of the superiority of magazine space over newspaper advertising?

The answer is: A curious turn of fate which the newspapers, despite some invaluable results produced in a short time, could not control. The story behind it is one of wide interest.

The Waltham watch has been advertised for years. But until the last six years or so, its annual appropriation was confined to the $60,000 class or less. Waltham-made watches cost money. Typical prices were, last year, $225, $145, $210, $45, $150, $22 and $65, taken at random from some of the popular numbers in the line.

A product like this, the company argued, was peculiarly adapted to magazine advertising. It was a quality article bought by people who have money and who have good taste. The magazine pages showed off the product artistically and with great dignity. Besides, magazine advertising, the company was assured by numerous periodical solicitors, was "quite the thing to do." Results, to be sure, had to be pretty much guessed at in a general way. It was not easy to tell just what the magazine copy was netting.

In 1921, the Waltham Watch Company had an unusual condition to break down. Swiss and other foreign-created watches were enjoying an influx into the United States. The average person seemed to "take" to the idea of an imported watch. There was another factor—many dealers claimed that Waltham prices were too high. For years Waltham prices had paralleled those of its chief competitor, Elgin. Now, with the war over, its prices were considerably above Elgin, and at a time when grumbling over the price question was rampant.

There was a wide-spread resistance to the Waltham Watch on the part of dealers. The president of the advertising agency which was in charge of the account, and treasurer and general manager of the agency, went out in the trade to get at the problem and its solution. It was found that the magazine advertising was not having the effect on the dealer it should and he did not fully appreciate what was being done for him. He simply was not reading the advertising and, when he did, he did not fully realize the lengths to which the company was going to back him up.

Following this survey, the agency recommended the adoption of intensive newspaper advertising to replace largely the magazine work. The Waltham concern, however, was not enthusiastic. It expressed the view that it would be lowering its dignity to change to newspaper space. And the officials wondered if advertising in certain cities and omitting others would not precipitate an avalanche of "howls" from the trade where local space was not used.

From the agency point of view, it is easier to "shoot" a full page in a national weekly of 2,000,000 or in a group of a few publications. The work is minimized and the maximum profit is realized from commissions. Therefore, EDITOR & PUBLISHER believes that great credit is due the agency which had the account, for the courage of its convictions in standing up against following the "easy route," and in insisting that newspaper advertising be used, even though it meant higher cost for the agency and far less "velvet."

On October 1, 1921, the company launched a 13 weeks' campaign in a large number of cities. At the end of that time, returns had been so satisfactory in direct sales and dealer interest and co-operation that for 1922 the agency was able to put into effect the policy of 80 per cent of the year's appropriation for newspaper advertising. The agency had done pioneer work also on other accounts in showing the value of local newspapers as an advertising medium.

During 1922 the Waltham advertising appeared in newspapers in 155 cities in the United States and 40 cities in Canada. The agency requested the promotion department of each paper to go out and get tie-up advertising paid for by the dealer to appear either at bottom or top of Waltham copy or on all sides.

It not only requested, but insisted on tie-ups. It endeavored to pick the best newspaper, from the point of view of circulation and of quality, in each city. If the newspaper neglected to get the tie-ups, the agency switched the advertising to another paper which would do it. In one city the newspaper did no tie-up work and paid no attention to letters. The account, therefore, was switched to the next paper, which for a time did the local work well, but then became careless.

The advertising agency was about to take the account from the city entirely, as was the custom where local co-operation could not be secured, but the advertising manager of the city's leading paper would not listen to such a proposal and produced a contract with the three principal jewelers of the city to run special space beside every Waltham insertion as long as the advertising appeared.

Up to September 1, 1922, the Waltham Company had bought and paid for 792,000 agate lines in newspapers at a cost of $95,000, and dealers paid for 260,000 lines, worth $31,000, of which the manufacturer received the benefit through newspaper co-operation. Through the newspaper a local man was enlisted, in a sense, on behalf of the Waltham Watch Company. He stirred up interest. The dealers not only saw the copy in their local papers and realized they were being backed up, but also spent their own hard cash, and $126,000 worth of advertising was secured for $95,000. Can general magazine advertising show results from dealers comparable to this.

Some of the magazine solicitors were rather "sore," but when the case was put up to them, all had to admit that the magazine could not offer the wonderful result-getting co-operation the newspaper gave.

Another point—there is tremendous duplication in national magazine circulation. Through the newspaper, duplication is cut to next to nothing. Waltham used one paper in a city. The agency sold the idea of using the newspaper to its client by comparative figures showing how much less expensive and how much more effective the newspaper is.

Later figures compiled on a basis of what was done showed the stand for newspaper advertising was correct. A much-played up national weekly, with a circulation of 2,000,000, costs $7,500 a page. It was possible to place an advertisement, 220 lines, which was found to have the best attention value on the page for Waltham purposes, in 150 cities, having a population of 34,000,000, with 8,639 circulation, for $3,783.

Magazine solicitors said "Ah yes! But there is nothing so dead as yesterday's newspaper." The agency countered by replying "There is nothing so live as tomorrow's."

Twenty per cent of the total appropriation continued to be used in magazines for a background. Various smart publications, like Town & Country, Vogue, the Spur and the National Geographic, were on the list. This copy emphasized the mechanical perfection of the product and featured various styles. It was distinctly subordinate to the newspaper space and in time it is probable all or nearly all of the appropriation would have been turned into the more productive channel. Some export and automotive publications were used.

The newspaper copy used by Waltham was notable because it demonstrated conclusively that newspaper display can be put to use admirably for a high quality product. The form of the copy had been given much attention. At the top of each advertisement was lettered the descriptive title, "The scientifically built watch," above an artistic reproduction of some specific style, with its catalog number and its price. High-priced models were featured. The copy below was set in type which in three or four paragraphs suggested reliability. The trustworthiness, the reputation behind the watch, its fine time-keeping qualities and the pleasure which comes from owning s watch all were insinuated into the rea mind deftly in a high grade way. name, "WALTHAM, the world's over time" was featured at the botto all copy. The speedometers and mobile time-pieces of the company mentioned briefly at the bottom an general jewelry slogan, "Gifts that was included. The company offere mail a book on watches on reque

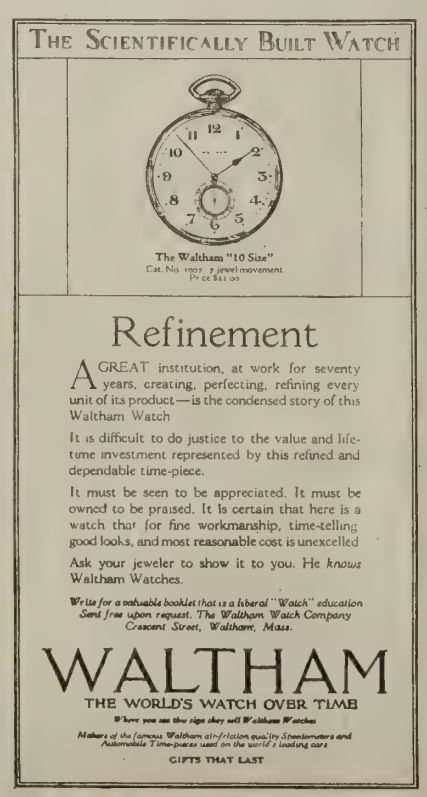
How did using the newspapers out? The Boston agency prove actual production that copy worthy watch could appear to advantage on print. The bugaboo of "slighted de in cities where advertising did no pear turned out to be trivial. were no "kicks"; in several cities, d asked advertising to be used and ised tie-ups. They were of course given it.



Many definite sales were traced di to the use of the advertising. INSURANCE PLAN OF PROFIT - SHARING ENGAGES PUBLISHERS' ATTENTION

Employes of Several Important Newspapers Have Received Gift of Policies from Owners, and Other Forms of Aid to Staff Hold Great Interest for Employers

"Have you any information as to what other newspapers are doing in the way of insuring their employes, pensions, compensation for injuries, etc., or on newspaper profit-sharing plans? We are investigating this matter with a view to putting ideas along this line into effect on the ..... and will appreciate any assistance you can give us."

SEVERAL letters similar to the one quoted above sent EDITOR & PUBLISHER out on the trail of the information. Plenty of it is available regarding group insurance. Pension data is not so frequently come upon. No other definite plan of profit-sharing is effective among the newspapers to whom EDITOR & PUBLISHER sent its questionnaire, but several newspapers give their employes annual gifts, which are apportioned on various bases, mostly home-made.

The subject is of practically universal interest among wide-awake publishers and executives today. Only two of the publishers who answered the letter consider group insurance or profit-sharing schemes "socialistic" or "paternalistic." Several state frankly that while they have no such ideas working now, their plans may be guided by the information that EDITOR & PUBLISHER found in other offices. Practically all expressed interest in the data to be gathered. And with that introduction, here it is:

Hilton U. Brown, general manager of the Indianapolis News, outlined the plan that paper instituted last July, providing for old-age pensions, life insurance and sick insurance, through the Indianapolis News Employes' Fraternal Association. In Mr. Brown's words:

"Briefly, the employes pay into the fraternal association 35 cents each week, regardless of their salary. The News contributes a like amount for each employe. From this fund the Fraternal Association contracted for life insurance for each employe, ranging from $500 up to $800, depending on length of service, the $800 being obtainable after five years. The average yearly premium on this group life insurance is $14.21 per member, though the actual premium per individual is based on the age of the members. This insurance was placed with the Metropolitan Insurance Company.

"The sick insurance provides for all sickness and for accident not covered by the employers' liability insurance, i. e., all accidents occurring not in line of duty. The premium on this is .6882 cents per annum per $1 of weekly benefits, or in other words, approximately $10.11 per annum per employe. Sick benefits begin on the eighth day of sickness or accident and are paid for not to exceed ten weeks on each case, although there is no limit as to the number of weeks' payment in a year, provided there is a well interval between. No employe may receive sick benefits in excess of two-thirds of his weekly salary.' The sick insurance was placed with the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Ltd.

"The residue of the funds, after payment of the premiums noted, together with incidental running expenses of the association (salary of a secretary, who transacts his business while in the employ of the News, $260 a year, and necessary supplies; total expense probably not exceeding $400 a year) are put into the pension fund, which is not to be drawn on for a period of five years from date of organization. After the five-year accumulation period, the interest on the accumulated fund, together with the excess of current dues payments over expenses, is to be used to pay pensions. The pension plan provides that if a man shall have been in the employ of the News 35 years, he may, with the consent of the board of directors of the fraternal association, retire on a weekly pension equal to 30 per cent of his weekly salary average for the last three years of his service. Or, at the age of 65 years, 30 years shall be the maximum years of service required to receive a 30 per cent pension. No person is eligible to a pension, however, until he has been in the service of the News ten years. His pension shall be in proportion to 30 per cent of his salary as the number of years of service bears to 30 years. No pension shall in any case exceed $30 a week and ceases on the death of the pensioner. Female employes' retirement age is 60 years. If an employe becomes disabled through sickness or other cause due to no wilful act of his own, he has the privilege of retiring on a persion subject to the term of service, but disregarding the age limit. The $30 maximum applies.

"Pension payments may be reduced temporarily by the directors when members' contributions and the interest accumulation from the permanent fund are not sufficient to pay the current year's pension payments and expenses after the yearly insurance premiums have been deducted.

"The eleven directors are elected by the membership from the paper's various departments.

"The News volunteered to pay the first year's life insurance premium, which amounted to something over $4,000, so that the first year's life insurance will be at no cost to the fraternal association."

J. E. Chappell, assistant to the publisher of the Birmingham News, stated that insurance was carried on the life of each employe, ranging from $500 to $3,000, according to length of service and rank in the organization. No definite profit-sharing plan has been instituted as yet, but each employe receives a Christmas present, ranging from half a week's to two weeks' salary, according to length of service. Employes are divided into six classes:

Less than six months' service—one-half week's salary.

Six months to one year—one week's salary.

One to three years—one and one-fourth week's salary.

Three to five years—one and one-half week's salary.

Five to ten years—one and three-fourth week's salary.

Over ten years—two weeks' salary.

At Christmas each year the oldest employe in point of continuous service receives a handsome watch, men who have received the watch in previous years stepping aside for the next senior in point of service.

Compensation for injuries is cared for under the state workmen's compensation law.

The Houston Post, according to Roy G. Watson, its president and publisher, insures its employes as follows:

"Our insurance feature starts with a minimum of $500 and is increased at separate and distinct periods until it reaches the maximum of $2,000. Disability is also covered in the life insurance policy. Our pension is used only in extreme cases. We carry insurance on injury, which covers medical and hospital attention. It gives the beneficiary 60 per cent of his salary if he is disabled for more than one week. Medical and hospital attention are given in every case. The policy also covers various amounts for loss of life or limb."

One of the most complete systems is that of the Detroit News, which is outlined by H. S. Scott, its treasurer and general manager, as follows:

"The News conducts a two-bed hospital with the latest and fullest equipment, including that for the treatment of nose and throat, with a very efficient nurse especially trained in the ordinary nose and throat treatments.

"This service was recently extended. One of Detroit's leading general physicians and surgeons has been attached to our staff, whose services are furnished all direct employes residing in Detroit, wholly at the expense of the News. This includes all attentions, both medical and surgical, either at home or at the doctor's office, with no charge to the employe. Employes living outside of the city are limited to physician's free service at his office during regular hours.

"We have very few deaths on the part of employes, but just in case some unlucky individual should 'get away from our doctor,' we have an insurance policy which entitles every regular employe of the paper, who has been with the Ne for one year or more, to $1,000 at dea no matter from what cause, nor are th any 'strings' on the question of be ficiary. We have had this insura plan in effect for several years, we is our own policy, and carry our own r and, I may say, at less than half cost charged by the regular insura companies for such group insurance. medical examination is required.

"We are now contemplating and deavoring to perfect a pension plan old employes who are compelled to g up active duties through age or illn This will require that a fund of a c siderable amount be established, so t the earnings of same when invested cover all demands made upon this fu through the system we expect to inau rate at an early date."

W. L. MacTavish, editor of the Win peg (Man.) Tribune, declares that o 75 per cent of the employes of that pa applied for group life insurance when management broached the plan. As result, the Tribune Employes' Mut Welfare Association was formed, one rector being elected from each depa ment. At first $1,000 policies were ered to each employe, which it is p posed to increase year by year for th years until a maximum of $3,000 reached. Employes pay half of the p mium, the company paying the r Averaged over the whole staff, says MacTavish, the premium on a $1,0 policy is $8, and the cost to the co pany is easily worth that and more overcoming the difficulties caused labor turnover.

All employes of the New Orlea Times-Picayune, regardless of salary rank, are carried under group insuran states L. K. Nicholson, manager. T only requirement is that the insur must have been employed by the pa for at least six months. At the end that period he receives a policy for $5 At the end of a year the policy is creased to $1,000 and thereafter the poli is increased $100 a year until the ma mum of $1,500 is reached. The Tim Picayune provides pensions for e ployes who have grown old and are longer able to give it their services. T state compensation law requires insu ance to cover injury to employes in li of duty.

"The Times-Picayune gives no hom building aid to employes," Mr. Nichols declares. "However, we do everythi to make life worth while to our e ployes. We have found that our orga zation has been materially helped by t group life insurance, in that its mora has been strengthened and employes gi closer application to work than former It is our belief that no mistake was ma in giving group life insurance to o employes."

The Canton (Ohio) Daily New through General Manager C. W. Uffor states that its group life insurance ca ried on all employes over 16 years of a "brings about a much better feeling t ward the office among our employes a seems to be highly appreciated. Whi we have not as yet established any meth of caring for employes as to pensio old age, etc., we have extended to a nur ber of our employes assistance as home-building. We lend them money they desire to build and have save enough money to prove their qualific tions, and it has been very pleasing us that both the money we lent and not we have signed have been prompt cared for by our employes. It is large a selection of those employes whom w consider worthy, and our judgment ha so far proved entirely that our help appreciated."

Charles D. Atkinson, business manage of the Atlanta Journal, advises that a employes are insured under a group in surance plan, premiums paid by the pape and with benefits ranging from $500 $3,000, based upon length of continuou service with the Journal.

The Syracuse (N. Y.) Journal, say H. D. Burrill, president and publisher has paid three claims for $1,000 eac under its group life insurance with th

EMPLOYES SHARE IN NEWSPAPER'S PROFITS UNDER GROUP INSURANCE PLAN

"INSURANCE is used as a measure of profit-sharing by policies purchased under the group or wholesale plan," Louis E. Orcutt, a New York insurance agent, replied to EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S request for a brief outline of the kind of insurance best adapted to newspaper problems. "The group plan is used where there are 50 or more employes. The wholesale plan is used where there are less than 50. The insurance is Term Insurance on the yearly renewable basis, and is usually written for a minimum in the case of a new employe, increasing to a maximum in the case of an older employe. The usual minimum is $500, and the most frequent maximum is a year's salary. The premiums on this insurance are paid by the employer and the insurance remains in force during employment, ceasing when the person insured leaves the employ of the insurer."

In general, the plans outlined in the adjoining columns will be found to meet these specifications, with modifications to fit individual requirements. It is about the only method of profit-sharing that has any general following in the newspaper business. Other forms of participation by employes in the year's profits are by no means as immutable as the laws of the Persians and the Medes, and, of course, they cease to function when there are no profits.

Other forms of aid to employes, such as financial assistance in home-building, cannot be considered as profit-sharing, but they are said to help mightily in keeping a newspaper manned by the kind of force that a successful publisher prizes. The medical assistance furnished by several newspapers, notably the Detroit News and the Washington Star, has been found valuable in keeping high the health record of a large organization and making days off for illness less frequent, thereby reducing the cost of operation.

There are no doubt other forms of profit-sharing and welfare work which this brief survey has not covered. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will be pleased to hear from any other publishers or editors who have worked out plans of this nature, and to publish their views in future issues.

didn't make any difference what the Paris or the Berlin papers carried, it wasn't news until you saw it in the Amaroc. We were the one and only source of authentic information.

The files of the Amaroc News make the only complete and unbiased history of the American occupation on the Rhine. If you want to know what the whole thing was about, what we did with four years, read up on the local pages of the only daily published in the history of the army, the Amaroc News.

Never was a newspaper received with more enthusiasm than was our first issue. It filled a real need. It was advertised as a paper for, by and about the Rhine Army. It never fell down on the job. More than a hundred thousand men were patrolling the Rhine in the olive drab. didn't cover our local field, which was didn't cover our local field, which wts most important to us.

It was a brilliant success from the start. There were real newspaper men to be had for the asking in those days. They rallied around the new born and started things off with a bang. Glance at the file for the first year and you'll see that there was no room on the Amaroc for hams. From first to last its staff consisted of the best men available on the Rhine.

No matter what your job was before you got on to the staff you were a newspaper man before you got through. You had a reputation to live up to and a high standard to follow.

My own rise from nobody to the editor of the Amaroc is an example of what others did. I wouldn't swap the experience I gained during the eighteen months the Amaroc lasted after I joined the force for many, many greenbacks.

The first month I felt that I was no use to myself or to humanity. Major Mueller, who was then the boss, took the handful of us in hand, established a school for journalism, bawled us out most efficiently when we pulled a bonehead play, and finally instilled into us some idea of what a newspaper man's duties are. As the old-timers got discharged into civilian life we youngsters stepped into their shoes. And we made good. The only reason I ever got a job on the Amaroc was because the sheet was well nigh desperate for men at the time.

I found myself writing telegraph after awhile and actually proud of my own work. From re-write man to telegraph editor, to night editor, to managing editor, all in year and half. Some record I claim.

We were good, all of us. This is not self flattery. It's facts. The proof of it is that from first to last we furnished some hundred recruits to the big time papers. Former members of the Amaroc staff are scattered from one coast to the other, but they all are sticking at the one game.

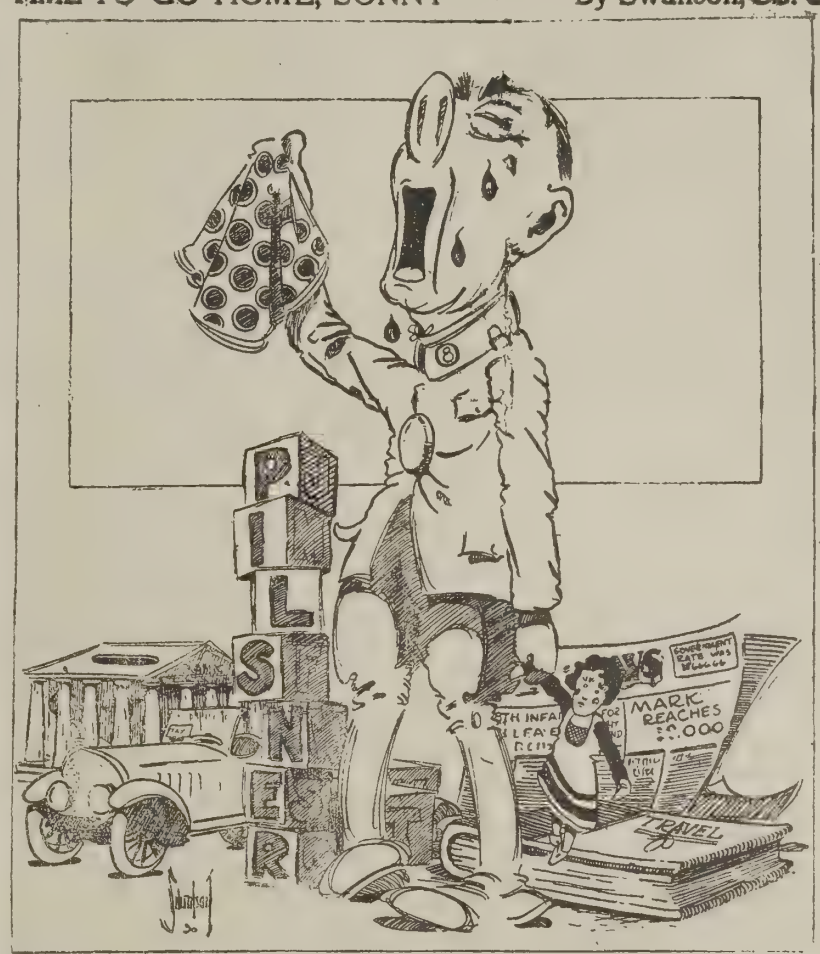
There is Kirby and McGill in Detroit, and Clarke of the A. P., and Goode on a California paper and Wilde on a New Jersey daily and Jimmy Moran on the Boston Transcript. They haven't burned up the world yet, but watch them grow.

"Blinky" Dimes, the last man we took on as a cub, turned out to be a whirlwind. He galloped in and got the big story while the A. P. man and the New York Times man were warming their heels in the bureau of some minor official. Old "Blinky" will show them all something yet. It was pleasure to see Dan McGrew handshake the august boss of the regiment out of the latest local dope, while majors and captains waited without.

We had our troubles. Once we ran a forty-eight point streamer across the top "FRENCH TROOPS PREPARE TO MARCH INTO RUHR." It seems that M. Tirard, head of the Rhineland High Commission, didn't like either that streamer or the story that went with it. We had the dope right but that didn't make any difference.

A diplomatic note found its way into the office of General Allen and the managing editor had to explain. It took two hours of talking and a lot of healthy call-downs came the way of a disgusted editor. He went back to his desk and dished up an editorial on flying in Borneo for the next day. It certainly hurts when you have to choke a good story.

We had to straddle the fence. If the news of the day at all cast any reflections on the policies of either our allies or the Germans we had to handle it very gingerly or there was the devil to pay for it. The Germans had the habit of making capital of anything they could construe as being pro-German in trend.



Besides laying off the powers you had other things to contend with. Worth, our feature writer, who traveled even into the Literary Digest with his last story, attended a polo game at the home athletic field. A certain officer was displaying a queer brand of horsemanship. He spent a good deal of his time climbing on again and his descents were not as graceful as they were picturesque.

Friend Worth could not control that sense of humor. The next day the tale complete in every detail crept into the sport page. Private Worth caught a whiff of Gehenna but the boys had a laugh.

Not the least interesting part of the Amaroc's history is the story of its financial ups and downs. When the sheet was at the height of its prosperity it had a circulation of about 68,000 daily. It sold for ten pfenninge, less than a cent at the current exchange rate. We never

SMALL CITY NEWSPAPER NEED NOT RISK FORTUNE FOR RADIO SUCCESS

A 100-Watt Set, Costing $400, May Not Transmit from Coast to Coast—Or It May—But It Will Get the Newspaper's Name Into Homes Where It Is Welcome and Profitable

By EUGENE LEUCHTMAN

EDITORIAL NOTE—Mr. Leuchtman, who is a member of the South Bend Tribune's regular staff in addition to his duties as its radio editor, believes that the small newspaper which overlooks radio is missing an opportunity to get close to its readers at small expense. His story tells how the Tribune has done it without investing thousands in elaborate equipment or keeping as many thousands tied up in pay for a large staff.

THE broadcasting of radio programs from newspaper radiophone stations has been the subject of much grave discussion. Much ink has been spilled regarding the advisability of maintaining an expensive and troublesome novelty costing thousands of dollars, but the situation facing the "piker," the case of the flivver broadcasting station has not yet been given consideration.

As an instance, take the case of the newspaper between 20,000 and 25,000 circulation. It is essentially a home paper. It stands to reason that a newspaper, circulating among the smaller villages and towns, on the farms, and issued from the smaller cities, is more or less a family affair. The newspaper of that size is looked upon as a friend of the family. The things that draw the interest of the reader of that paper are not those in which the reader of the metropolitan daily is interested. The former has the personal touch, and in this way is usually the better mirror for the reflection of public sentiment than the big city paper.

To a newspaper of the small city type, radio is a godsend. Is there a better means of getting circulation than by the personal touch? The intimate contact with the potential subscriber may be obtained, at its best, through the smaller radio station. The small-town paper, if it is not a freak, is not nationally known. The very fact that it prints mostly those things of interest to a restricted locality circumscribes its interest. It usually plays up features, and radio, being the most attractive of features, gets the circulation. The radio station comes in as a very attractive means of letting the public know that the paper is on the job and up to the minute.

The community served by a 20,000 circulation paper does not, as a usual thing, get to hear the great or the near great. It is seldom, even with the establishment of the Chautauqua, that it has a chance to hear good music, hence it is a field for the radio merchant. Interest in these communities is correspondingly greater than in the larger cities, where such things as good plays and good music are available. The greater the number of receiving sets, the greater the demand for radio features, and the paper with the radio features gets the readers.

The radio problem confronting the newspaper of this size is the maintenance expense. There are several standard transmitting units on the market, which may be installed at small cost. The cost of keeping the thing going is the biggest factor in radio transmission. The Government demands that the transmitter be operated by a licensed commercial radio operator. This is an addition to the pay-roll. The procuring of programs, the handling of the entertainers, all of which must necessarily be done intelligently, needs the time of a tactful and competent person. The actual operation of the transmitter is left to the licensed operator. The operation of the program end of the affair goes to the studio director, who may, in the case of a low-powered station, manage also the business end. Replacements do not cost much. The amount of electricity consumed is negligible.

The flivver set is essentially the set for the piker, and radio, if it is to show a return of any kind, is a piker's game. In proportion to the amount spent, in proportion to the circulation, the piker has more to show for the establishment of the radio station than the metropolitan newspaper. A 100-watt transmitter does not cost more than a few cents a week for actual operation. Theoretically, it has a range of about 100 miles, but one of these 100-watt units, home-built, has been heard from coast to coast, and from Alabama to Manitoba. It cost less than $400.

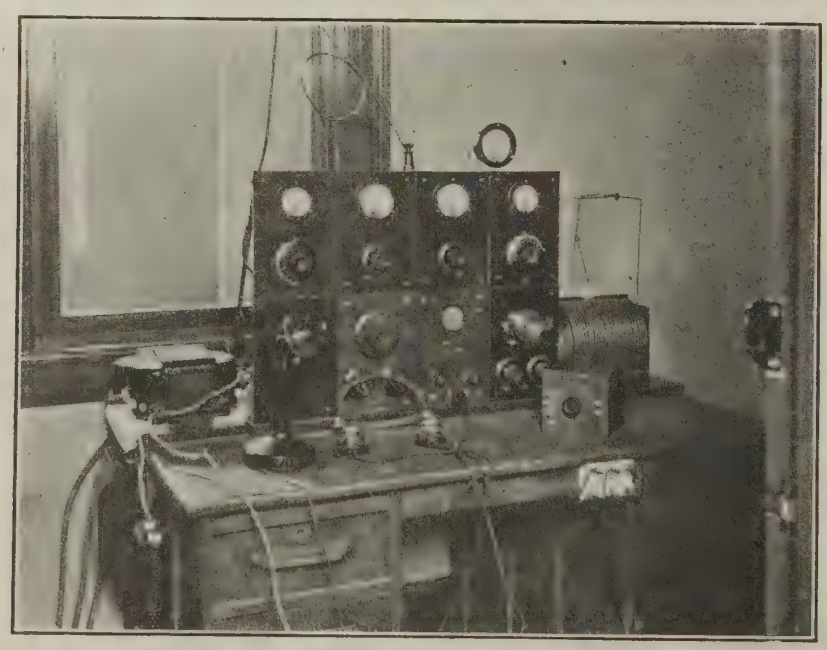
The low-powered station serves its master well. Its listeners are not the people of the entire nation. That may sound impressive, but in the case of a paper of 20,000 circulation it is criminal waste and almost wilful interference with the big stations, which can afford to broadcast better programs. The small paper does not aim to spread its fame country-wide by radio. It is satisfied if the country within a radius of 100 miles is thoroughly covered.

To the people of the nearby towns and villages the low-powered station offers much by way of entertainment. The housewife is given a menu in the morning. One of the girls on the paper's staff reads off some household hints at 9 o'clock. There are hundreds of housewives who appreciate this service and listen for it religiously. Again, at the time those on the farm are resting from their work, and the city people are home from their jobs, a program of canned music is given. Later in the evening, at a time when it can be done to the best advantage and with the least interference with the gigantic transmitters, a regular musical program is given. At this time, also, questions of local interest may be discussed, and matters of importance to the people of the surrounding country taken up. Perhaps a speaker of local reputation gives a short talk. At t rate, it is seldom that a person of tional reputation is heard over the ver radio station, but what is sai really of interest to those who hea The evening program winds up the d day.

It may be thought that programs scarce in cities of less than 100,000 p lation. That is not strictly the case. South Bend there are many excellent sicians, some of nation-wide fame, an least one pianist of international rep tion, and as long as they are not c upon too often, they are more than to give radio an hour or so of their t It is remarkable, the better the perfor the less talk there is about pay for show. The time when it will be ne sary to pay performers is far, far a When that time comes, the flivver sta is willing to quit.

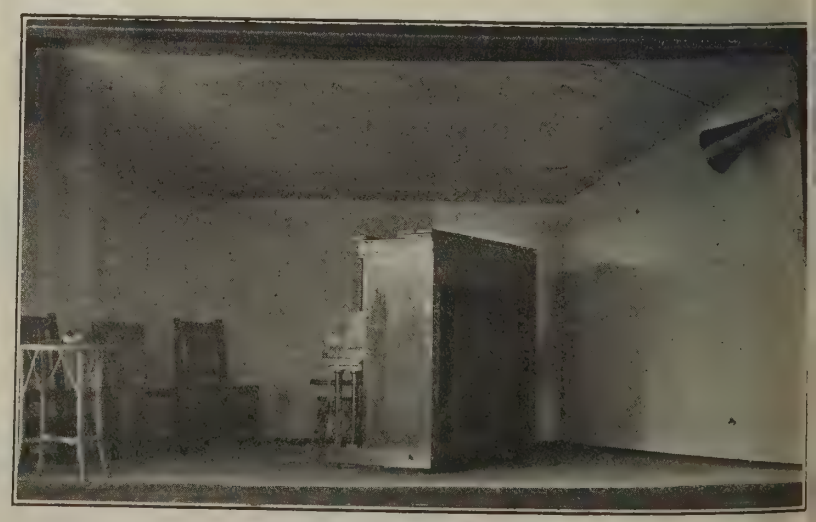
The South Bend Tribune started ou the broadcasting game independen The Tribune's radio department had ganized a radio club. A member of club, an amateur thoroughly versed the science, offered to sell a 100-w radiophone transmitter for $375. price was paid, the set installed in excellent modern building, and ano member of the radio club, who "knew stuff," was sent to Chicago to take examinations for a commercial licens

The radio station is operated by club, and has, since its start, acquired enviable reputation among the listen in as being technically almost perf It has set what is believed to be a tional distance record for broadcas with 100-watt power, but that was not aim. It is not an experimental aff and is under the management of the ra editor of the Tribune, who has ot duties and performs them. Aside fr the money spent for radio parts to periment with the newest kinks, a rate for replacements and maintena may be set at $2 a week. The cost operation is nil. There is very little tra expenditure required.



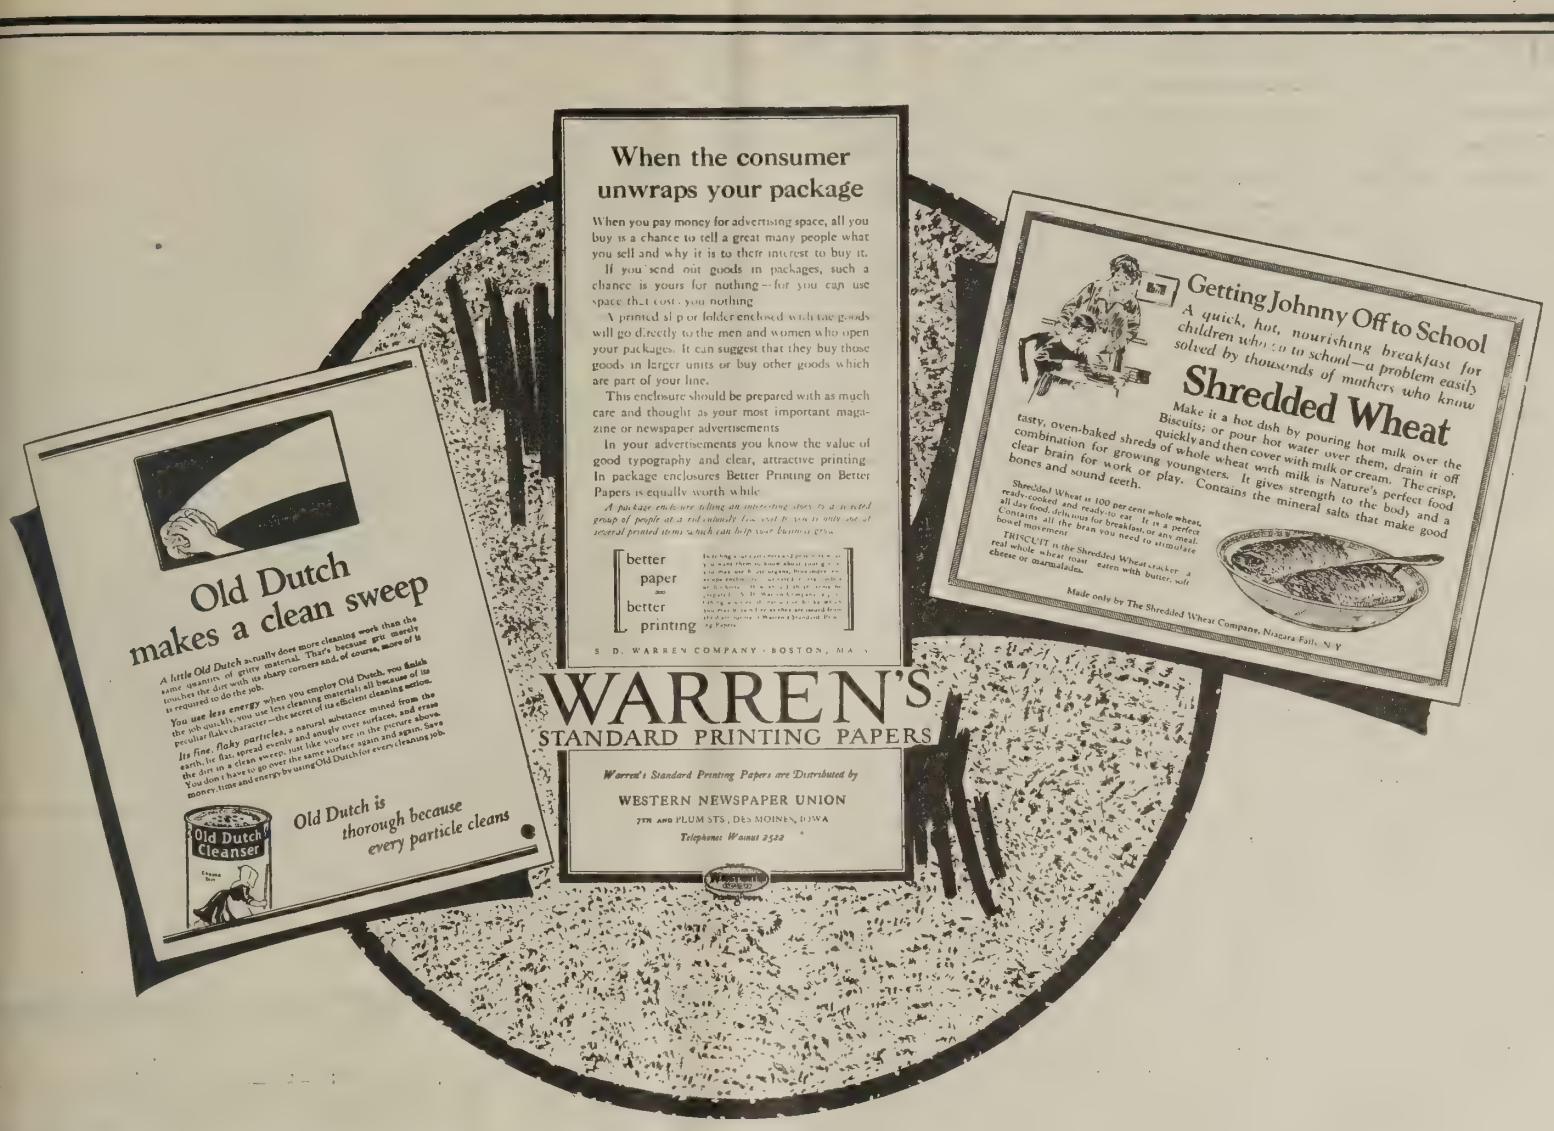
The work of getting the program is the hands of a competent member of staff. The radio editor handles the bu ness end of the station and attends the technical problems. Every kid town is his friend, and persons in ested in radio call upon him as a s of a court of last resort. The stat and the Tribune's radio department l the personal touch in keeping in cont with the radio enthusiasts, and in way the interest awakened along ra broadcasting lines gets the paper the s scriptions and the readers who wo otherwise be dangerously neutral.

South Bend people and people in s rounding cities and towns have got habit of referring more and more to radio department of the Tribune beca they are treated with courtesy, as frien and because the radio editor has no to grind. It takes up a lot of his ti and sometimes at the most inopportu moments, but he doesn't care. He's radio fan, too.



FLIVVER RADIOS FOR PIKERS

"MR. ARNOUX'S article in the February 24 issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER is a concise and accurate statement of the things that face the big radio broadcaster," comments Mr. Leuchtman. "He made one mistake, however. He said that radio is not a piker's game. I have attempted to prove in the accompanying article that it is essentially a piker's game, and that only the piker can hope to get anything like an adequate return on the investment made in radio."



And he has done so. With an initial equipment cost of $375, a salary to an operator (part-time) and services as radio editor of a member of the staff who is a radio fan, the South Bend Tribune does not seem to have attempted anything beyond the reach of the small daily. Like Mr. Arnoux, of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, he is enthusiastic over the possible concrete return to the publisher, but neither of them point to any specific circulation or prestige gains that have resulted from the activities around the broadcasting set. Such things are taken on faith by the radio enthusiasts, whether in Fort Worth or South Bend, and for the present, it appears that publishers will have to do likewise. Given the steady personal contact with readers, however, it is entirely probable that the faith will "do its stuff."

The transmitting and operating room at WGAZ is small, a dressing room off the auditorium stage. The 1,000-volt motor-generator set is under the floor on a concrete base and the heavy leads at the left of the table are connected to it, and to the box switch on the left end of the table. The announcer's microphone is on the table. The double wire leads to the broadcast microphone on the stage. The box-like instrument is a small wave-meter. The middle panels of the lower half of the instrument are for receiving. The wire from the binding post on top of the board leads to the antennae on the roof. To the right of the receiving panels is the chopper modulator for continuous wave telegraphy. It is not in use, however, as the station's license is for phone broadcasts only. The loop is the wire leading to the aerial and is for the use of the wave-meter. The switch in front of the table permits either sending or receiving.

The radio editor of the Tribune built all the apparatus. The auditorium stage, which can accommodate a full-sized orchestra, is equipped with a sound box that cuts echoes to a minimum. At the upper right is the specially-built non-vibrating horn for the broadcast microphone. Three microphones are used, though arranged in such a manner that only one is in the circuit at a time. The operating room is within 15 feet of the announcer at the left and the operator can listen in at all times.

Old Dutch Cleanser advertising, placed by Williams & Cunnyngham Agency, of Chicago, S. D. Warren Printing Paper Company advertising, placed by the George Batten Advertising Agency, of New York, and the Shredded Wheat advertising, placed by the Frank Presbrey Company, of New York, are samples of big exclusive advertisers in The Des Moines Capital.

Shredded Wheat has advertised exclusively in the Capital for more than ten years, and with great success.

Old Dutch Cleanser and the Warren Paper accounts are both new in the Des Moines field, and the Capital was chosen as the exclusive medium. All of these advertisers are meeting with splendid success.

The Des Moines Capital is the biggest evening newspaper in Des Moines and Iowa. The total circulation in February was 64,167, and the city circulation was 30,480. The 1920 census gave Des Moines a population of 126,000. This circulation means that almost every one in Des Moines sees the Capital every night, and it means that the tributary territory within a radius of 75-miles is thoroughly covered.

Other Big Important National Advertisers Who Advertise in The Capital regularly are the

Gillette Razor	Congoleum	Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.	Domino Sugar
Victor Talking Machine	Ladies Home Journal	Simmons Beds	Continental & Commercial National Bank
Columbia Graphophone	Butter Nut Coffee	Coca Cola	None Such Mince Meat
Munsingwear	Wrigley's Gum	Eline's Chocolates	Cunard Steamship Lines
Calumet Baking Powder	Literary Digest	William Penn Cigar

Important Note.—The Capital competes with a publisher who advertises a morning and evening newspaper combined as a single newspaper with a single circulation. This confuses many national advertisers, but the local advertiser knows the true situation.

INGOMAR GETS AN EAR-FULL FROM HIS DAD ON ADVERTISING IN WEEKLY JAZZ

Montmorency, Jr., Takes Up the Question of Selling Horse Collars and Learns a Lot About "Prestige" and Why Newspaper Suckers—A Bedtime Story for Advertisers

By JOHN WILBERFORCE PEABODY

"PAPA," said Ingomar Montmorency, Jr., "what good is an advertisement?"

"Which advertisement?" inquired Montmorency, Sr.

"Well," said Ingomar, who packed a lot of poise for one so young, "take this advertisement here in the Weekly Jazz if you want me to be specific. Here is a two-page ad in three colors of a concern making horse collars in Oklahoma."

"Ah!" said his father, after perusing the ad. "This is a very useful thing indeed. You ask what good it is. In the first place, the artist who drew that beautiful picture of an Ethiopian giant holding a bunch of lilies was handsomely paid—perhaps $2,500 in real money, which he could spend on his little girls and little boys. Then the Weekly Jazz got fully $15,000 to insert it, which helped to buy all the nice white paper the magazine needs to print those stories that you and the other estimated ten readers to the copy scan so eagerly. Then a person called an advertising agent received a commission of 15 per cent of the price of the advertisement for bringing it to the Weekly Jazz. This commission helped the agent pay traveling expenses when he took a trip to see another kind advertiser who was spending money in other mediums which the agent thought should be spent in the Weekly Jazz."

"But what good does this advertising do the man who makes the horse collars—the man who pays for it?"

"Well," said Ingomar's father, "it probably pleases him when he looks at it, especially when he forgets what it cost. Not every reputable person can get his name into colored print, so that all the people in the country (or a great many more, if we can read magazine circulation figures and multiply fast enough) will know how he spells it in case of argument. Then he has a lot of friends at the Merchants' Club who will say, 'I saw your ad in the Jazz.' That, in some cases, is worth all the money. Finally, he makes a speech to his employes once a year and this ad will give him something to talk proudly about."

"But," observed Ingomar with a somewhat puzzled look, "doesn't he advertise chiefly because he wants to sell more horse collars?"

"That depends upon the kind of memory he has. His original purpose in advertising was no doubt to sell more goods. But the people who persuaded him to take this ad told him so many other things the ad would do outside of selling goods, the chances are he has forgotten all about sales by this time."

Ingomar still looked puzzled and his father continued:

"You see, my dear son, the keynote of this kind of advertising is conversation rather than results. The people who push it, have to keep talking all the time.

"This manufacturer is probably a sensible, practical man when it comes to fitting comfortable collars on horses. But when he gets out on the sea of words that surrounds this type of advertising, his bump of direction becomes a dimple. When he told the advertising people that he wanted to sell more horse collars, they doubtless replied that the way to do it was to create national prestige for his trade-mark. Creating national prestige, apparently, is trying to induce people who never owned a horse to talk about something a horse should wear to make him happy and handsome."

"Does national prestige finally sell horse collars?" inquired Ingomar insistently.

"That also depends," replied his father. "If the manufacturer asks that question of the agent or of the magazine, he will be told it does finally sell goods in this way:

"The magazine man says his publication goes to the most important people in every community. He is very accommodating in offering proofs of this assertion. If he is talking to a maker of a $5,000 automobile, he can prove that only users of this kind of car read his paper. If his prospective customer is an overall maker, he can show just as easily that all his readers wear overalls. So he has no difficulty in demonstrating that a goodly number of the owners, or at least acquaintances, of the handsomest and proudest horses, still prancing in spite of the general distribution of Ford cars, read the Jazz in every town. The national prestige behind the trade-mark, of course, induces some of these people to inquire about the advertised collar. Perhaps somebody will try to buy one if he can find a dealer who has them in stock. Presently, the word goes round that Mr. Smivins, who runs the depot cab, and other powerful citizens have spoken of the Fiction Horse Collar, and the theory is that everyone who buys horse collars will instantly follow the suggestion of these social and financial leaders and make a purchase. All the dealers who never heard of the collar now rush madly to the long distance telephone to order them and the manufacturer has sold ten million dollars' worth of goods over night."

"That," said Ingomar gravely, "sounds to me like the bunk."

"I do assure you, my son, that I am stating the magazine advertising gospel according to its greatest prophets. To be sure, it is a doctrine that requires faith, not to mention sap, but thus it is written."

"Assuming you are serious," replied Ingomar—"although I doubt your good faith in this matter—does this program ever pan out in actual results? In other words, does the advertiser finally cash in on all this conversation?"

"That is not the intention, my son," replied his father. "I have told you merely something about the hypnotic influences used to stimulate the vision of prospective advertisers. Of course, if the advertiser comes out of his trance and really insists upon getting something more than a tickling sensation in his dome, the magazine men have several cards up their sleeve.

"First, they reproduce thousands of copies of the advertisement and call the manufacturer's salesmen together. The salesmen are locked in a small room and each one is handed a strong cigar. When the apartment is sufficiently filled with smoke to induce a state of semi-coma, five expert ballyhoo artists that represent the Division of Occult Oratory rush in waving copies of the advertisement and using a chant invented by Professor Hokum. They then convince a large number of those present that what they see before them is advertising. The salesmen then are sent to see the dealers with the idea of passing on to them a state of mind which is called Dealer Enthusiasm for Consumer Acceptance. A dealer thus inoculated by the salesmen is supposed to order horse collars and work twenty-four hours a day to sell them."

"I should think that the shots of hop passed to these salesmen by the experts would grow cold before the salesmen could reach the dealers," said Ingomar.

"Yes," said his father, "but the representatives of the Jazz are resourceful. If this inoculation fails to stampede the dealers, the Jazz directs the advertising agent to see what he can get the newspapers to do. Letters are written to newspaper publishers telling them to send men out to retailers and to ask them to buy newspaper space and to advertise the fact that they handle Fiction Horse Collars. Newspaper men are supposed to be sitting around their offices waiting for suggestions as to how they can jimmy more space out of local merchants, and the kindly advertising agent thereby gives them a grand idea about getting new business."

"Does this finally sell horse collars?" asked Ingomar, who seemed to have only one idea throughout the whole discussion.

"Yes," replied papa, "if the agent can get enough newspaper men out talking to the dealers. But the agent does not stop here. He has one other trump card to play. He writes a series of articles on 'What the Horses Will Wear This Year,' featuring, of course, the Fiction Collar. These articles he sends to newspaper editors, who don't know anything about advertising, but who believe their readers may be interested in fashions for horses. The editors then print these articles and send a nice clipping to the advertiser to his agent."

"What do the newspapers get for the articles they print?" asked Ingomar.

"They get called 'suckers,'" replied his father.

"Do they ever get any real advertising from the manufacturer?" asked Ingomar.

"No," said his father, "the advertiser finds out that he can get this advertising for nothing, so he says to himself, 'There's no use paying for something that some one is willing to hand you on a silver platter.'"

"It strikes me," said Ingomar, after due reflection, "that a magazine ad is a kind of ticket to an exposition with a lot of free coupons on the side. All the magazine advertisers have to do is to buy one of these tickets, walk through the gate and use the coupons for the side shows, which represent the dealers in the newspapers. It seems to me, however, to be a trifle risky, because the game is only good so long as dealers are silly about spending their money to sell goods that the manufacturer ought to sell, and newspapers are boobs about giving up their columns to a lot of free slush that ought to be put into decently written advertising and paid for."

MAKE YOUR DETROIT SCHEDULE MORE FLEXIBLE

A Choice of Days Will Give Your Advertising Position Advantages.

DETROIT is experiencing a prosperity today that rivals the peak period of 1920. Already many automobile manufacturers are finding it difficult to keep production in pace with demand. There will be a shortage this spring both of cars and skilled workers.

Advertisers, realizing Detroit's unusual prosperity, are endeavoring to capture the Detroit market through The Detroit News, Detroit's greatest circulating newspaper. As a result, The Detroit News finds itself in a tight place on many days for space. This is a condition which could largely be obviated if more advertisers were to follow the practice of many prominent advertisers and allow The Detroit News some choice of publication days. Such advertisers find that The News is enabled to place their advertising most advantageously.

Twice a week advertisers would also find it advantageous to order one insertion in The Sunday News, which now has more than 270,000 circulation. The week day and Sunday combination is the ideal in Detroit where the population is composed of such variegated elements that it is advisable to reach them both through the Sunday and week day medium. The Sunday News makes one appeal and the week day News another. Some elements prefer certain sections of the paper Sundays which they do not read week days and vice versa. Cover all Detroit by using both issues of The Detroit News at pro rata cost.

SPHINX MEN CELEBRATE BY BOOSTING

New York Is Theme of Famous Organization of Advertising Men at Dinner That Was Up to Pre-War Standards

The "Boost New York" dinner of the Sphinx Club at the Waldorf-Astoria Wednesday night was one of the most successful in the history of that organization of advertising men.

H. F. R. Huntsman and Preston P. Lynn composed the committee in charge and the menu, entertainment and Wanamaker decorations, that have made that organization famous, were up to the pre-war standards.

Mayor Hylan, one of the speakers, took occasion to pay his accustomed respects to the press. He said that the news columns of the daily papers are such as to impair the value of advertisements and decrease transit population in the city.

Chairman George McAneny, of the Transit Commission, formerly an executive of the New York Times, said he could imagine no greater honesty than that displayed by the newspapers.

"This is true not only of the editorial and news departments, but of the advertising department as well," Chairman McAneny continued. "It is more difficult to get a dishonest advertisement into a New York paper than to conduct a camel through the eye of a needle. What New York owes to its newspapers for its growth, beauty and honesty is impossible to compute."

Other speakers included Senator Royal S. Copeland, Herbert J. Case, deputy governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York; Robert Grier Cooke, president of the Fifth Avenue Association, and William Grady, assistant superintendent of schools. Will Rogers, the actor, and "Jocko," the trained crow of the Hippodrome, provided the fun that went with the dinner. Corbett McCarthy, president of the Sphinx Club, presided. About 450 diners were at the tables.

The guests for the evening were:

Clifton D. Jackson, secretary of the New York Advertising Club; Theodore E. Damm, president New York Advertising Men's Post of the American Legion; H. O. Barnes, secretary New York Business Papers Association, Inc.; Roger W. Allen, treasurer of the National Publishers' Association; H. E. Taylor, vice-president New York Business Publishers' Association; Harold S. Buttenheim, New York Business Publishers' Association.

John Sullivan, secretary-treasurer of the Association of National Advertisers; N. H. Bragdon, president New York Business Publishers' Association, Inc.; J. George Frederick, treasurer New York Sales Managers' Club; Fritz J. Frank, vice-president Associated Business Papers, Inc.; Ralph R. Mulligan, president of the Six-Point League; Theodore P. Seymour, American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

George L. Alpers, Representatives' Club of New York; P. C. Gunion, president Technical Publicity Association, Inc.; G. Lynn Sumner, vice-president Association of National Advertisers.

Federal Trade Commission Scotches Attempt to Mislead Public

Citations for false and misleading advertising issued recently by the Federal Trade Commission indicate that the Commission is giving considerable attention to what the commissioners believe may constitute illegitimate methods of publicity.

The question of alleged misrepresentations regarding the ownership of oil and gas leases and false statements concerning the financial standing of the company, is raised in citation brought against the Roller Oil & Refining Company, Inc., of Mexia, Tex.

Charges of unfair methods of competition in connection with advertising also has been made by the Commission against the Harris-Mexia Trust Company of Fort Worth.

B. F. Steinmetz & Sons Company, a Washington retail clothing concern, cited to show cause why a recent "special sale" conducted by the company was not in violation of the Trade Commission act, has been ordered to desist from further practices similar to the ones used in connection with the sale. The sale was advertised as a "forced sale" and the facts developed by the Commission showed that the company had no intention of retiring from business.

False labels designed to lead the public to believe that its zinc products are manufactured in France, caused the Commission recently to order John McQuade & Co. of Brooklyn to cease the practice.

Advertisers' free trial of commodity when no free trial was provided brought a complaint against the Hygienic Laboratries of Chicago and Turner & Porter of Buffalo were charged with unfair competition for advertising printed stationery as relief engraving.

Mme. Johanna Gadski Tauscher brought suit in the Supreme Court March 15, against Henry E. She based her complaint on an article in the Tribune of February 25, 1923, which it is alleged was written by Mr. Krehbiel, in which allusion was made to the sinking of the Lusitania in the war and a subsequent celebration in the home of "one of the singers of opera." The article did not mention either the name of Madam Gadski or her husband, but she contends that she was the singer referred to, that the allegations were false, and that they greatly injured her in reputation and in her profession.

When Collier's Weekly showed that many of Hearst's European representatives were fictitious characters, and when the Associated Press obtained an injunction preventing the Hearst news organization from stealing Associated Press news, the same kind of trickery was disclosed that the LOS ANGELES TIMES has brought to light, year after year, in connection with the advertising claims of Hearst's Los Angeles newspapers.

Whereas it is easy to expose fraudulent advertising claims, a thing that can be measured and seen by all, it is virtually impossible to make like exposures in circulation where the opportunities for fraud are limitless and beyond detection. But there is a test of circulation which transcends all claims—results to advertisers!—and because of its incomparable results, the circulation of the LOS ANGELES TIMES is patronized by more national advertisers, more local display advertisers and more classified advertisers than any other newspaper in its field, and not only leads all California newspapers in total volume of advertising but for two consecutive years has been "First in Advertising in the World."

OKLAHOMA PRESS BILL IS DOOMED

Would Put Control of News and Editorial Columns Under Political Supervision—Is Opposed by Newspaper Men

The Clark Nichols' proposal for licensing Oklahoma newspaper men which, if passed, would give the governor of the state direct control of the Oklahoma newspaper field, has met with a hot reception from Oklahoma editors.

The bill, which was introduced in the State Senate by Nichols, of Eufaula, should it pass, would make it possible for the governor to prevent any newspaper man from working on any newspaper in the state.

The bill is an outgrowth of the bitter political campaign last fall when J. C. Walton was Democratic candidate for governor of Oklahoma and was opposed by a number of the largest newspapers in the state.

He made the public boast during his campaign that when he got to be governor he would show certain newspaper publishers of the state how to print a truthful paper. Walton was elected.

Nichols, who himself is not a newspaper man, is believed to have had little to do with the bill other than to introduce it in the Senate.

The Nichols' proposal has been the target of newspaper ridicule for the past week. A canvass of the state senators indicated that the bill has little chance of passing.

Almost every editorial comment on the bill has taken the form of criticism.

The Daily Oklahoman (Oklahoma City, Okla.), the state's largest newspaper, said: "One cannot but believe that Senator Nichols intended it as a subtle satire on disposition of certain members of the present legislature to create a number of new jobs for persons hungrily moving toward the pie counter and to place everything in the state under the control of the politicians in power."

The bill, which is believed to be doomed to defeat, follows:

An Act creating a Board of Examiners for newspaper men and journalists; defining a newspaper man and journalist; providing that it shall be a profession; providing for a license for those of the profession so created; providing for the apointment of said board; defining its duties; providing rules and regulations for the licensee; providing for forfeiture of said license; providing fees for said license; making an appropriation therefor and providing for the punishment for violation of this act, and declaring an emergency.

Be it enacted by the People of the State of Oklahoma:

Section 1. Definitions.—(a) For the purposes of this Act the newspaper business and the business of journalism is hereby declared to be a profession. (b) A newspaper man is declared to be any person who has the active management of a newspaper, either as managing editor or owner, or who supervises the gathering of news, or who gathers and writes news stories for a newspaper or who writes editorials in a newspaper, whether said newspaper be edited daily or otherwise. (c) A journalist is declared to be any person who writes stories founded on either fiction or fact, either signed or unsigned, which are published in any magazine, periodical, pamphlet or tract, of regular or irregular publication of either general or restricted circulation in this State or which is published in this State, and circulated in the whole or in part of this State. (d) A Student is declared to be any person working as a newspaper man or journalist who has not passed the requirements herein provided for to be entitled to apply to the Board herein created for a license.

Section 2.—No person shall practice the profession of a newspaper man or journalist in the State of Oklahoma without first having procured a license from the Board of Examiners for newspaper men and journalists, as provided for in this Act.

Section 3.—There is hereby created a Board of Examiners for newspaper men and journalists, to be composed of five members. The Dean of the School of Journalism of the State University shall be one member; the President of the State University shall be one member, both of whom shall serve without pay; and three members to be appointed by the Governor, who shall serve the tenure of the office of the Governor appointing them unless sooner removed for cause, as provided by law for the removal of other State officers. The Governor shall designate one of the three appointed by him to be secretary of the Board, who shall devote all of his time to the business of the office of said Board, and who shall receive a salary of Twenty-Four Hundred ($2,400.00) dollars per annum, payable monthly. All of the members appointed shall have had at least five years' active experience as newspaper men or journalists in the State of Oklahoma. Each member of said Board shall take the oath of office prescribed for other State officers before entering upon the duties of office. The Secretary shall not be connected with any newspaper or publication whatsoever while holding said office.

Section 4.—The Board shall prescribe rules and regulations for the holding of examinations for all applicants, and minimum standards to be reached by all applicants before receiving a license to carry on said profession. Any graduate of any accredited school of journalism of this State or any other State may be licensed by said Board, in its discretion, without an examination, but said Board may require all who apply for license to take its examination.

Section 5.—All persons practicing in this State as newspaper men or journalists, at the time of the passage and approval of this Act, must immediately apply to said Board for a temporary license, which shall be good for one year from date, and shall expire on said date, and which may be revoked the same as other licenses as provided for herein. When said temporary license has expired by its own limitation, said licensee shall then apply to said Board for a permanent license, and comply with the rules of the Board in obtaining same. A license fee of Ten ($10.00) dollars, shall accompany each application for a license, same to be turned over to the State Treasurer within ten days after its receipt by the Secretary of said Board.

Section 6.—The said Board shall be furnished with an office in the State Capitol, and said office shall be equipped by the State Board of Affairs out of the appropriation herein provided for.

Section 7.—The Board shall have authority, and it is hereby made its duty, to forfeit any license granted hereunder for the following reasons and in the following manner:

(a) When it shall be ascertained that any applicant made any false statements or representations in procuring his license.

(b) When any licensee is convicted of a crime against the laws of the State of Oklahoma involving moral turpitude.

(c) When any licensee becomes an habitual drunkard.

(d) When any licensee prints or causes to be printed, or permits the printing and publication of any story or news article about any citizen of this State or nation which is not true.

(e) When any licensee prints, or causes to be printed, or permits the printing and publication of any news article, story or editorial, which either directly or by insinuation, falsely charges any citizen of this State or nation with an act which hurts the standing or reputation of such citizen in the community or State or nation, either in a business or social way.

(f) When any licensee prints, causes to be printed or permits the printing and publication of any news item, editorial or story which is immoral or degrading.

Section 8.—The Board shall have authority on its own motion ot bring charges against any licensee for the violation of the above section.

Any citizen may file charges, which must be verified, with said Board against any licensee for the violation of the above section.

When the Board on its own motion, or on the verified charge of a citizen, takes up the matter of forfeiting a license, it shall give the licensee ten days' notice of the hearing thereon. Said hearing shall be had before any member of said Board or the entire Board. The Secretary of said Board shall be authorized to administer an oath to all witnesses appearing at said hearing. The evidence shall be transcribed and preserved as a public record in the office of said Board. The complainant, the Board and the licensee may be represented by counsel, but the hearing shall be informal and under rules to be promulgated by the Board. If the Board shall decide the complaint is not justified, it shall so state in an order to be entered in the record of the case. If the Board finds the cause sufficient, it shall order a forfeiture of the license under consideration. Any licensee who has had a license forfeited shall not be allowed to apply for a new license for a period of three years. If the complainant or licensee shall feel aggrieved by any order made by the Board, said person may have the cause reviewed on writ of certiorari, to the District Court of the county in which the hearing was had. The original hearing by the Board must be held in the county where the complainant resides, or if on motion of the Board, in the county where the news item, story or editorial was published. If the hearing is held before only one member of said Board, the testimony shall be submitted to the whole Board, with the recommendations of the member hearing same, and the final decision must be rendered within thirty days after said hearing.

Section 9.—Members of the Board while attending hearings or deciding cases shall receive Ten Dollars per day, to be paid out of the appropriation herein provided. The Board may compel the attendance of witnesses as provided for attendance in the District Courts of this State.

ARBITRATORS CLEAR A BIG DOCKET

Seven-Man Board Settles Long-Standing Disputes Between A. N. P. A. Members and Typographical Union

Five disputes between members of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and local typographical unions were settled by a seven-man board at a recent meeting of the International Arbitration Board in Indianapolis. John S. Saulter, an Indianapolis business man, who has served in that capacity before, again occupied the seventh chair and rendered the decisions on cases that had been deadlocked at previous meetings. Five cases came before the regular six-man board, decision being reached in two. The outstanding cases were those in Cincinnati, where the seventh man reversed a wage award by a local arbitrator, and in Chicago, which involved a dispute over change in dress of the Evening Post. This dispute was referred back for local settlement. Decisions of the board follow:

SACRAMENTO, CAL.—This case involved the discharge of two union members for not representing their situations on a certain night. They had been restrained by officers of the law from being at their place of employment and, therefore, their offense was caused by acts beyond their control. The decision of the board was that the parties discharged be reinstated without prejudice, without loss of priority and without back pay.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.—A Springfield newspaper declared that, having abandoned piece-work as a temporary expedient, he was within his rights in attempting to restore it, and that such restoration was arbitrable. The A. N. P. A. chairman and the I. T. U. president had disagreed as to the arbitrability of the question, and the board sustained the local union as follows:

"It is to be assumed that all publishers and local typographical unions operating under an individual arbitration contract underwritten by the International Board of Arbitration of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and the International Typographical Union are familiar with all the rules governing all matters involved during the life of the contract.

"From the evidence submitted by the publishers and union, I am convinced that the representative of the publisher of the Springfield Republican having knowledge of the International Typographical Union policy as indicated in section 98, page 74 of the International Typographical Union laws, and in sequence thereto, his communications under date of March 22, 1919, and April 15, 1919, he implied, in ambiguous language perhaps, that the adoption of the time-work scale on August 1, 1919, was to supplant the piece work scale permanently, and the arbiter so rules."

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—The publishers of Cincinnati daily newspapers had appealed from wage increase granted by a local award. The union had appealed against other provisions of the local award. The decision of the board reverses in substance the award of the local arbiter as to wages, but upholds it on all other points. The decision as rendered is as follows:

"That Section 1 of Article iv shall read: "All employes of morning papers shall receive per week of six days, not less than:

Foreman	$63.75
Assistant foreman	57.75
Machinists	51.75
Assistant machinists	47.75
Machine helpers	42.75
All other journeymen employed by the week	51.75

"That Section 1 of Article iv shall read: "All employes of afternoon papers shall receive per week of six days, not less than:

Foreman	$56.30
Assistant foreman	50.30
Machinists	48.30
Assistant machinists	44.30
Machinists helpers	39.30
All other journeymen employed by the week	49.30

"All other sections of the contract adopted by the Cincinnati local board of arbitration are concurred in."

CHICAGO.—In this case the management of the Chicago Evening Post had installed a body type larger than that theretofore in use which the men claimed would affect their earning as bonus operators. The matter came before the International board upon a dispute as to jurisdiction, and the following decision was rendered:

"I am unable to find the existence of any authority that grants the right to the publisher, or the union, to negotiate a 'waiver' implied or otherwise, that would, to my mind, break down the force of the established procedure as provided for in the arbitration agreement, viz: Paragraph 2 of the local award of the Chicago Board of Arbitration as of May 22, 1920:

OUR OWN WORLD OF LETTERS

Edited by JAMES MELVIN LEE

MONG those who made the su- preme sacrifice "Somewhere in lance" was Quincy Sharpe Mills, an torial writer on the New York Sun. s letters, written for the most part on nch battle fields, have been collected a volume entitled "One Who Gave His e" (G. P. Putnam's Sons). It con- ns not only the letters but also a sketch Mills' life by his former chief, James by, formerly editor of the Evening n.

Many of the letters are fine examples the art of reporting for Mills was a lled literary craftsman. If space per- tted, his description of "No Man's nd" would well be worth quoting. The letters are supplemented by the nments which Mills as censor found the letters of his men. Some of their irical remarks throw more light on t how the American boys in France than many of the recent histories. The book is not without some criticism those higher in authority. But such ticism is necessary if the reader is to a true picture of the conditions as y actually were and not as a commit- on public information would have you ieve. In the deluge of war books, ny could well be spared—but not "One o Gave His Life."

JST as Mr. Mills never saw his let- ters in print, so William McCor- k, formerly editor of the Reading a.) Times-Herald, never saw a bound y of his book, "The Problem of the rking Boy" (Revell Publishing Com- y). Mr. McCormick died only a day so before an advance copy was mailed his editorial desk.

OWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN, author of "Trodden Gold" (Little, wn & Co.), is a member of the ad- tising agency of David C. Thomas & , of Chicago. From 1912-1914 he was or and publisher of Art. His novel, way of contrast, strikes a somewhat note in fiction, in that it is a study only of those who are afraid of pov- but also of those who are afraid of es. For the newspaper man familiar h all phases of American life, this el by Mr. O'Brien will have a special eal.

R PHILIP GIBBS begins in the World's Work for March a series rticles entitled "Adventures of an In- ational Reporter." His first article ribes how he exposed Dr. Cook's r fraud. How Gibbs reached his clusion that the alleged discovery of North Pole was a big fake contains gestions that ought to be useful to r reporters in deciding questions of icity in covering interviews with peo- who have just sprung into public . But aside from this practical e, his article is a news story worth ling because it gives the reader an le view of how a reporter works.

ERBERT S. MALLORY has com- piled an anthology of essays on cism to which he has given the title ckgrounds of Book Reviewing" orge Wahr, Ann Arbor, Mich.).

ALPH D. PAINE'S book, "Roads of Adventure" (Houghton, Mif- & Co.), is an autobiography of a rter whose assignments have often full of hazards. It will be men- d more in detail in a later issue of OR & PUBLISHER.

WHETHER literary editors, "read books" is often a subject of humorous debate but if they will read "Books Reviewed" (George H. Doran & Co.), by J. C. Squire, editor of the London Mercury, they will pick up some valuable tips about the work in their own field.

The blurb on the cover tells the truth when it says:

> In place of a conscientious "review" of a new book, Mr. Squire has frequently used the new book's appearance as a springboard for his own plunge into literature, both past and present.

It might be noted that the critical essays in this volume did not first appear in the London Mercury but in the London Observer. As Mr. Squire is a critic of unusual discrimination, he is a good author for the cub reporter to read.

ANOTHER novel by a newspaper man is "The Code of the Karstens" (Little, Brown & Co.), by Henry Walsworth Kinney, editor of the Tokyo Trans-Pacific.

THE Indianapolis Times is running a series of novels by Indiana authors. The novel now being published is "Alice Adams," by Booth Tarkington.

NEWSPAPER life and newspaper characters seem to be creeping somewhat frequently into American fiction. "Black Oxen," by Gertrude Atherton (Boni and Liveright), was suggested by a headline in the New York World. One of the leading characters is a "colyum conductor." He doubtless will pass muster among lay readers, but he does not seem quite real to those in the newspaper business. As to the novel, itself, critical opinions will doubtless differ. Critics who like one kind of paper will praise the tale and those who prefer another type will want to throw the book into the hell-box.

I AM not writing advertisements for insertion in this department, but "The Big Scheme of Simple Operation," published by the Mergenthaler Linotype Company of Brooklyn, ought to be interesting reading matter for reporters. They know too little about the machines which put their copy into type. This booklet describes clearly and succintly all operations. It is so clear that any layman can understand it.

IN answer to several inquiries about the market for copy other than news I recommend "Where and How to Sell Manuscripts," by William B. McCourtie (The Home Correspondence School, Springfield). The present edition was published in 1920, but I understand another is now being compiled. It is the best book of its kind available for literary workers. The jacket says the book mentions 6,000 markets for manuscripts. The office boy will please certify.

THE Saturday Evening Post recently published another satirical thrust at the press. Because it was in the Sense and Nonsense department it may have escaped the attention of members of the staff. It would have the reader believe that the door of the news room is closed to truth. "Tell her I am in conference," says the managing editor. In my opinion, the public is more critical of the press than ever before in the history of American journalism. An explanation may possibly be found in the "Sense and Nonsense" published in the periodicals.

DEUTSCHES Museum für Buch und Schrift of Leipzig, Germany, has published a series of documents relating to the journalism of Germany. Number one of the series is a reprint of Newen Zeytung auss Presillg Landt (New Tidings Out of Brasil Land). HOAX OF OLD VINTAGE IN WASHINGTON

When "The Flirt" Was Due on Films of the Capital, "Anti-Flirt" Club Broke Into the Newspapers

By Sam Bell
Washington Correspondent of Editor & Publisher

Washington, reputed home of the press agent, at least the brazen type of publicity man developed in war days, recently witnessed a revival of the oldest form of the craft—the hoax—a method of obtaining entrance into news columns, common to pre-war times, when a yarn had to be planted and disguised to resemble what editors believed to be news.

And let it be said for the Washington newspapers, Washington correspondents, and even the conservative press associations, that the hoax went over for news column type and pictures in a manner seldom equaled by the most important of governmental hand-outs.

The legion of publicity men and women in Washington today are wondering if it would not be a good thing after all to revert to the days when press agents possessed imagination and talents other than mere ability to pound a wordy typewriter —the ancient days when the press agent game was confined largely to the circus and the theater.

The publicity hoax that fooled Washington was a little stunt designed to inform the public of the merits of a motion picture entitled "The Flirt," filmed from Booth Tarkington's story. It was the press agents of "The Flirt" and a Washington movie house that brought into being the "Anti-Flirt Club" pictures, some of which still are finding their way into the illustrated sections of American dailies.

Let Leonard Hall, of the Washington News, the newspaper that claims credit for exposing the hoax, tell the story of the rise and fall of the Anti-Flirt as he did in the columns of his own journal:

"The most successful publicity hoax in recent Washington history is at its appointed end. Tomorrow newspaper advertising will trumpet the news that the Rialto Theater will show Booth Tarkington's 'The Flirt' all next week.

"And this, then, is the tale of 'The Washington Anti-Flirt Club,' and how it gained acres of newspaper space for a motion picture.

"So perfect was the working out the plan to exploit the movie among the newspapers and citizenry that it should be told in detail, as a contribution to the film history of the town.

"One day, after the booking of 'The Flirt' by the Rialto, Miss H. R. Merrill, local exploitation expert for the Universal Film Company, was taken down with a case of bright idea. She took her pet idea—that of forming a local anti-flirt club in the local schools—to the publicity director of the Rialto. Together they hatched the dark plot to slip us all the chocolate-coated cyanide.

"Miss Merrill went out, corralled a dozen girls, told them what it was all about, had some Anti-Flirt banners sewed up, elected herself secretary of the Washington Anti-Flirt Club, and was ready for business.

"Her first move was to call the three afternoon newspapers and tell them that she and the other girls had decided to fight the flirtatious tactics of naughty men on the highways. All three papers bit on the tip like starving carp. Out raced the reporters and photographers. All three papers carried stories on the first page of their final editions that day. Two of them spread big pictures of the stern young ladies across their pages.

"That evening the Daily News detected the odor of a rodent, and dropped the tale of Anti-Flirts like a hot spud. But the other journals leaped to it avidly. Twenty-four hours after publication of the story in Washington it appeared in a San Francisco paper. Rep. Manuel Herrick wrote one of his characteristic letters in behalf of the Anti-Flirts, and yearned to address the club. A local editorial writer condescended to descend from his Olympus and speak benevolently in favor of the gals' labor for righteousness. Great news syndicates snapped pictures and wrote stories about the club and sent them broadcast. Washington was beautifully killed, stuffed, basted and done to neat, golden brown."

The Minnesota Range Press Club is to be reorganized. According to present plans, it will embrace newspaper editors and publishers of the Iron Range and will exclude all not devoting full time to editorial work. The elimination of a certain class of press agencies will also be attempted.

A Weatherproof Roller

We are a peculiar people and habitually sidestep new things until some one—like the first man to eat an oyster—tries out the thing, then if he survives a few more take a chance. After that there is a wild rush to follow suit.

Since the perfection of the modern newspaper presses, the problem has been a Roller that was not readily susceptible to climatic changes, and one that would not soften under the highest speed of the press. This has been accomplished in the Duplex Roller.

The Duplex is a twofold Roller. It is pliable, with a tacky surface to take and distribute the ink perfectly, clean out the form, and produce clean-cut presswork. It will give equally good service in hot or cold weather, humid or dry weather. It can be used in a very damp basement or a dry, artificially heated pressroom.

The Duplex Roller is manufactured at the five addresses given below.

Scripps-Howard
Prefer Ludlow for Display

THE Indiana Times of Indianapolis was the last paper added to the Scripps-Howard League of Newspapers. The composing room had been operated under the single-type method. This places all Indianapolis papers on the all-slug basis, the News and Star having previously been Ludlow equipped.

Fourteenth Installation

The new owners telephoned Ludlow Typograph Company for immediate shipment of one Ludlow and one Elrod Caster. They also requested that our representative visit Indianapolis the following day to receive specifications for matrices and accessories for their Ludlow equipment.

The following day this shipment went forward by express and our installation man left for Indianapolis that night.

The Scripps-Howard people have absolutely no financial interest in the Ludlow Company.

They have equipped their offices, one after another, with Ludlows because it pays, their experience with them dating from their first installation at the Cleveland Press in 1914. They have tried every other method for getting display composition and found the Ludlow method the best.

The long experience, the vast opportunity for comparison and the successful business record of this chain of newspapers should weigh heavily in the scale with those publishers who have not yet been able to decide for or against the Ludlow.

ADVERTISING

THE Tabor (Ia.) Business Men's Advertising Club staged a novel advertising stunt recently. It holds a special day every two weeks with a special name. This day it happened to be "chicken day." Top prices were paid for chicken brought to Tabor markets on this day. At three o'clock in the afternoon, 25 chickens donated by the merchants of the city, were turned loose on the streets. These chickens became the property of anyone who was lucky enough to catch one. On one leg is each chicken was a tag good for $2.50 in trade at one of the stores. Besides this, each merchant had a special bargain offer for the day.

The Women's Advertising Club held their first employers' night, with employers' as both speakers and honored guests, March 6, at the Congress Hotel. John Benson of Benson, Gamble & Slaten, and president of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, told of the place the advertising agent must occupy, as middleman serving both buyer and seller for a small profit. Reuben Donnelley of the Reuben H. Donnelley Corporation talked on "Reference Media." Other speakers who talked briefly were Mrs. Hutt of the women's department of the "Progressive Farmer," Homer Buckley, of Buckley, Dement & Co., H. C. Winchell of H. C. Winchell Company, Irvin S. Paschall of the Irvin S. Paschall agency, and "Jim" Buchanan of the James Riddle Farm Papers.

The contact committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the Tenth District met in San Antonio, March 11, to discuss plans for forming the Tenth District Delegation to the A. A. C. W. convention at Atlantic City in June.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Better Proofreading

PELHAM, N. Y., March 7, 1923.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I am sending you a check for renewal of our subscription. You ask for my views as to how EDITOR & PUBLISHER might be of more service to its readers. A difficult problem along broad lines, as I think you are filling the bill very acceptably and with refreshing enterprise at the present time.

However, if you can instill into our daily papers a desire for more accurate proofreading the current press would be improved. It seems to me that we are getting a breed of lackadaisical correctors of the press whose efforts are frequently non-effective.

Honestly, EDITOR & PUBLISHER is doing a great constructive work, standing out as a vigorous representative of a vigorous class of men. Keep it up, and here's hoping you will continue to be the banner-bearer.

The King-Crane Report

BEIRUT, Syria, February 20, 1923.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I have just recently learned that you have published the report of the King-Crane Commission to the Near East. We congratulate ourselves that one American journal had the courage to give to the public what our political machinery has illegally withheld for so long a time.

If in subsequent issues of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER you have quoted or commented upon letters which have come to you from various important personages dealing with this question of the Commission, I should be happy to have you send me copies of the addresses in Jerusalem.

I must admit my curiousity is great to know how and why you published this report. Perhaps during my next visit to the United States you will tell me.

Look Out for Jewelry Package Ads

LINCOLN, Neb., Jan. 10, 1923

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Many papers thruout the country have been printing advertisements of reputable jewelry firms who have been conducting $1.00 package sales, the advertisement stating that some of the packages contain articles valued as high as $50.00. We published a few of these ads in Lincoln and upon complaint of a postal inspector we were indicted and fined $50.00 by the Federal Court. I thought maybe you might want to pass the thing along and save somebody else some grief.

Is The Chicago Evening Post On Your Schedule?

It Should Be

If you are advertising an article that appeals to the higher intelligence or the more capable pocketbook.

This is demonstrated by the fact that it has for a number of years carried more business from several lines of high grade advertising than any other Chicago evening paper, such as passenger automobiles, electric automobiles, motor trucks, financial, railroads, music and musicians, insurance, etc.

Why not imagine that you are sending a personal representative to interview the prospective customers for your article? The success of your selling campaign would depend on the amount of sales as compared with the cost of calls, and it costs no more to call on a prospect financially able to become a customer than it does to call on one who has neither the money nor the ability to appreciate articles of merit. Would you send your salesmen to everyone listed in the Blue Book or would you attempt to cover the names in the City Directory? This is a fair comparison of THE CHICAGO EVENING POST, the class paper of Chicago, with the mass circulation papers.

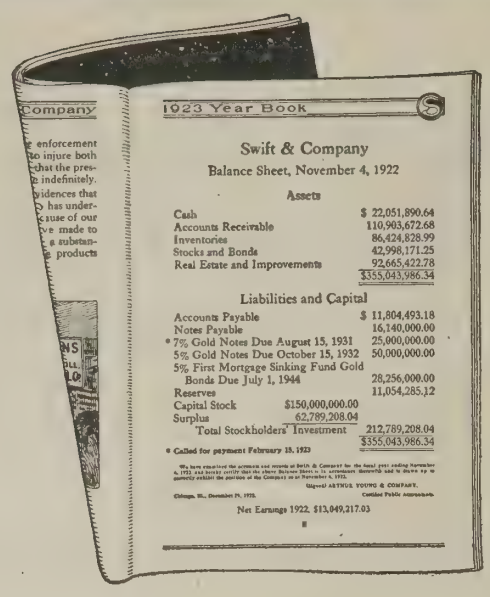
More Women Are Wearing Corsets—Are You Getting More Corset Advertising?

If you want more local and national corset copy, here's one way to get it:



Arrange to secure exclusive use in your city for Jane Hill's new series of eight articles on correct corsetry.

Then show your specialty shops and department stores what you are going to do—and sign them up for increases in local copy. From there it's not a hard step, nor a long one, to interesting the big national advertisers in increased newspaper space.

The eight articles will help women dress better. They stress style and comfort. They help the local merchant sell better goods all along the line. Your advertisers will welcome the Jane Hill series—which mention no type or brand of corset. The articles are exactly what your own fashion folks would have written for you, if they'd ever had time.

There's only one series of articles. They cost only your agreement to solicit local corset copy energetically. Are you the one newspaper that wants to build volume on corset advertising? Write for details.

BRITISH CLUBS A UNIT IN INVITING A. A. C. W.

(a) An understanding of the methods of British and foreign advertising which contrary to the opinion in America, are quite successful.

(b) An increase of knowledge on the part of American publishers and manufacturers as to the possibilities of the British and other markets.

(c) The possibility of setting up an international arbitration board, or control board on international patents, trade marks, which will save American manufacturers millions of dollars yearly.

At the time which it is proposed to hold the convention, the British Government will open in London what will be known as The British Empire Trade Exposition, which will be the largest trade exposition held in the history of the world.

The exposition will be held at Wembly Common, on a site covering over four hundred acres of land, on which they world's largest stadium has already been built, capable of seating almost two hundred thousand people, and where every product manufactured in the British Empire will be on exhibition. So earnest are the British trades people in regard to the success of this exposition, that now and for the six months past, every letter sent out of the United Kingdom has been stamped by the British post office "Remember the British Empire Trade Exposition," thus advertising it to every part of the world.

I need hardly point out what benefits in the way of trade and merchandising education should accrue to American delegates who will thus be in close association with the British Empire Trade Exposition. Here our advertising men and merchants and publishers will have an opportunity to meet the leaders of trade and industry from India, China, Japan, Australia, all the countries of the Orient with whom Great Britain does business. Here will be exhibited products in which we of the United States deal, indeed, but in the trading of which—they being British Empire products—Great Britain holds the lead. For here will be the rubbers from Malay and Singapore; teas and rice and jewels from India; coffee and minerals from Ceylon; agricultural products and diamonds and gold and ostrich feathers from South Africa; wool and hard woods from Australia; silks from China; pearls and copra from the islands of Polynesia; cotton from Egypt; furs and skins from Central Africa and ivory from Zanzibar and other British protectorates on the African coast. It will be a panorama of world-trade that the American delegates will see as a side-issue to the advertising convention.

At this exposition site the convention will be held.

A hall has already been set aside at Wembly with proper facilities for committee meetings, large gathering, refreshments, etc. This exposition will give an opportunity to interested Americans to study articles manufactured by Great Britain, and doubtless many articles will be found which are commercially successful in Great Britain, and which are not now being exploited here.

If the convention is held in London, it will, in my judgment, be the first real world advertising convention, because of delegates with which I will deal later in another section.

As part of the program, but not mentioned heretofore, it is planned to arrange that delegates from America will, after the convention program is over, be assigned to be the guests of those engaged in like business on the other side of the water. For example: A manufacturer of cutlery will be assigned to the cutlery industry at Sheffield, and he and his associates will go there as the guests of Sheffield, and factories will be thrown open and production and selling methods studied.

Consequently it is possible for the American delegates to gain important information as to selling and manufacturing methods which are not now in operation in America.

One of the most important benefits to be derived from the convention being held in London is a better understanding of British and foreign marketing methods; marketing possibilities, their economic conditions, and that intangible thing, which for want of a better phrase, I will call the development of a better understanding between other countries. Nor will this trade understanding be confined only to the English speaking people, because on account of the British Empire Exposition being held at the same time, American advertisers and merchants will have a chance to meet the leading merchants of the East and Far East, Africa, Australia, and the other countries of the world.

(3) Number of delegates which can be expected from countries outside of the United States and Canada?

From information which I gathered, it would appear that we could expect from within the United Kingdom approximately 1,500 delegates; while from France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, Hungary Czecho-Slovakia, Jugo-Slavia, Austria, Spain, China, Japan, and other countries, delegates have already signified their intention of attending in far greater numbers than ever before dreamed of. For example: it is practically pledged that fifty of the leading bankers, manufacturers, of China, and one hundred manufacturers, publishers and advertisers of Australia and India, with their unlimited possibilities, will be represented not only by manufacturers, but in all possibility by Governme officials.

(4) Finance?

Unquestionably, manufacturers, publishers associations of England are prepared to fi this convention as no American city financed a similar enterprise.

At the time I was in London, which w proximately sixteen months prior to the convention and almost six months prior t Atlantic City convention, at which time th cision will be made, sixty thousand d ($60,000.) had been subscribed from sources. For example: Lord Rothermer behalf of his papers, subscribed $25,000 Edward Hulton, on behalf of his papers, scribed $25,000, and the Newspaper Publi Association of Great Britain subscribed $1

From statements, which were made to r manufacturers and others, the questio financè is one which need cause no conce the American association whatever.

These subscriptions have been entirely v tary, as no attempts have yet been ma raise any money.

(5) What representation will the Thirty of London have at the Atlantic City Conv as a tangible evidence of their interest an thusiasm in securing the convention?

The best answer to this is that reserv have been made, on the S. S. Berengaria ing the latter part of May, for approxi one hundred delegates, which in my judg is more than ample evidence.

Reluctantly, and only because of instru from America, I had to point out to the L committee that the holding of the conventi London would deprive the American Assoc of the revenues from convention fees to th tent of approximately $10,000.

I was immediately assured that this wou taken care of.

(6) Hotel accomodations?

I met with the committee in charge c commodations, and I am satisfied that mor ample first-class hotel accommodations w available, the equal of, or superior to that can be found at any American convention

(7) Time involved.

The time involved for convention proper be approximately three (3) weeks, incl voyage.

(8) Cost?

While the final figures are not in hand, was sufficient data in evidence before London to enable me to state that w promise for the convention party proper class passage both ways on the Atlantic first class accommodations in London, at a cost of approximately seven hundred and dollars ($750.00).

(9) Entertainment?

Will consist of civic reception at port rival and London. Welcome dinner, parties at palaces and homes of imp people; theatre parties, Grand balls, sight- of historical London, Country-side and T

Some of England's finest country home be open for the entertainment of delegate their wives for week ends should they so Automobiles will be provided free, and i number of delegates wish to visit any par point in England, such as, Shakespeare's place, Oxford or Cambridge Universities particular industrial center, Windsor Cast other places of interest, arrangements w made for free transportation and guidanc other words, while the entertainment will different form from that in an American it will be full of interest, comfort, educatio enjoyment.

In presenting this preliminary report members of the committee who met in York, I unqualifiedly recommended to the they urge that the association should acce invitation, and they have unanimously agr this.

For the last six weeks, a corps of peopl been working in London preparing coverin on all points covered in this preliminary as well as data regarding the cost of a n of interesting continental and other trip delegates may wish to make, and this volu data will arrive in America within the nex or so.

I suggest that the committee accept th liminary report with my assurance that be backed up with the data which is now way, and that you write me immediately i ing your approval or disaproval of the pla authorizing me to forward this report president of the Associated Advertising Cl the World, with your unanimous approva that I be authorized to recommend to hi the association in accepting this invitati Atlantic City will in 1924 hold sectiona ferences in America, in place of its n conference.

The Brooklyn Standard-Union carries oup life insurance wtih the Travelers' e Insurance Company and New York ate accident compensation insurance employes, says H. L. Bridgman, busis manager.

F. A. Miller, vice-president and editor the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune, states t group insurance with the Equitable e Assurance Society of New York s put into effect January 1, 1923, on lives of employes who have been h the Tribune for six months or more amounts ranging from $500, increas- $100 each year to $1,000 at five years. ten years the amount is increased to 500. The insurance is without exse to the employe and has no relaship with salaries or wages. It is yable in case of death or total and manent disability of the employe. No dical examination is required. The icy is void if the employe leaves the ibune, unless he desires to continue premiums himself.

Our plan of insurance covers only th and starts with a $500 policy after months' employment," declares J. M. phenson, publisher of the South Bend ws-Times. "At the end of the second r, the policy calls for $600, increasing 0 a year up to the limit of $1,500. We ry compensation insurance for inies received in the plant, but have er gone into insurance for disability, ness, or pensions.

We aid through loans and endorsents on home-building, but have no d policy in regard to it. We have rated a profit-sharing plan among detment heads, but there are no fixed es on it, and it is given out purely our judgment of the efforts of each artment head during the year, genl efficiency of his department, inases made, etc. In the mechanical artment, it applies to the superintent, stereotype foreman and pressroom eman. Our experience going outside that has not been good. We paid sevl bonuses during the war and the reis led us to change our policy."

The Los Angeles Times cares for sonal injury by liability and comsation insurance in one of the old-line npanies. It has no definite profit-shar- plan, states J. Baum, business manr, although for several years it has en employes extra compensation at the end of each year. Amounts awarded in each year have been based principally on continuity of service and in special instances were individuals have shown efficiency and zeal, special awards have been made. This latter applies chiefly to executives.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer's employes operate a mutual benefit association which carries life insurance for every member, ranging from $500 to about $2,000. Weekly dues are 25 cents. The Plain Dealer matches the total of dues with an equal amount of cash. Membership also carries a sick benefit of $10 a week for 15 weeks. The fund now has a balance of almost $10,000. Officers are all employes of the newspaper. This paper also distributes Christmas bonuses ranging from a few dollars to $50, depending upon length of service.

Clayton P. Chamberlain, vice-president of the Hartford (Conn.) Times, advises that "while we have on a number of occasions carried some of our employes on a pension roll, we have never developed any definite scheme and to date have not attempted anything along the line of group insurance."

Edward Flicker, general manager of the Bridgeport Post and Telegram, writes "at the present time, we are not doing any of the things for our employes that can be construed as exercising paternalism. We did carry group insurance until it became apparent that it was not appreciated and we discontinued it."

Lafayette Young, Jr., general manager of the Des Moines Capital, says "the Capital has nothing in the way of insurance protection for employes. Would be much interested in the story compiled by EDITOR & PUBLISHER."

E. O. Syman, general business manager of the Kansas City Journal and Kansas City Post, states that while the present management has so far been occupied with the problems of reorganizing the properties and the building of a new plant, it is much interested in employe welfare and will be particularly glad to see what other publishers have to say.

F. W. Eldridge, managing editor of the Los Angeles Examiner, writes in similar vein—"We are a very young paper and have not worked out the problems about which you inquire in your letter; nevertheless we are keenly interested and will appreciate an opportunity to read the symposium you are collecting."

The Milwaukee Sentinel has insurance protecting the company against accidents which also takes care of employes who may be injured, says A. B. Cargill, general manager. This paper has no general system of profit-sharing, "merely a temporary bonus system in some of the departments that is hardly comprehensive enough to be entitled to any real recognition. We are greatly interested in the subject generally and will be much interested to read the result of your investigation along this line."

The New York Times in August, 1921, when Adolph S. Ochs celebrated the 25th anniversary of his ownership, presented every member of the staff with insurance policies, the Times paying premiums in full. The plan provides for pensions from a minimum of $20 a week to a maximum of 50 per cent of the average annual pay of the retired employe; for sickness and disability payments, and for life insurance ranging from $500 to $1,000. The arrangement is not contractual and may be changed by the directors at any time.

The Washington Star is also liberal in providing for employes who have grown old in service, or are unable to work because of sickness or disability, as well as providing for the families of deceased employes by insurance based on length of service. Dental attention is also supplied by the Star. Many of its employes have been assisted in the purchase and construction of homes, according to a story of the plan which appeared in EDITOR & PUBLISHER of April 22, 1922.

Aim At the Heart of Big Business in

WEST VIRGINIA

When we say "aim at the heart of big business" we mean the big centers of a small state where retailers and the general public are most anxious to secure everything that is up-to-date for the home and personal use.

It is only through close inspection of any territory that the national advertiser can expect to realize the possibilities of every field in which he markets his product. Such close inspection reveals the fact that West Virginia, mile for mile, compares favorably with any locality in wealth, purchasing power and resources.

Space will not permit a complete analysis of the West Virginia markets, but each of the following newspapers will gladly furnish you facts and figures regarding their individual territories and the State as a whole.

The cities represented in this list are the principal marketing and distribution centers of the State.

These newspapers promise co-operation with your sales promotion department.

It is time to "aim at the heart of big business" and learn how large this little State has become.

EDITORIAL

THE OKLAHOMA BILL

THE worst thing about the Oklahoma bill for the creation of a board of state examiners to judge all persons who wish to practice the profession of journalism is that it is political, and was conceived in revenge and not in the interest of fulfilment of the high ideals of the most important profession in the world today.

Senator Clark Nichols, who introduced the measure, is not a newspaper man and it is generally believed he had very little to do with drafting it. In the heat of a bitter political campaign of last fall, Gov. J. C. Walton made the boast that when elected he would show certain newspaper publishers of the state how to print a truthful newspaper.

Gov. Walton is known best to the American press as a man who did more to feed the fires of American hate abroad than any other individual of record, by staging a great inauguration barbecue at which enough food was wasted to feed any of the starving peoples of the Old World for a week. His new effort to gain editorial control of the press of the state should be judged by that record.

No one is more awake to the fact that there can be no responsible, personal journalism so long as there is no binding, ethical, professional code and a method for enforcing it, than newspaper men themselves. Journalism is a loose-jointed thing as it exists today. It gathers its workers from every walk of life. Some are unfit, but are able to hang on to the outer edges and do inferior work simply because they are cheap labor. Others are brilliant, but dishonest, but by audacity, good fellowship and friendship, are able to continue on their way and bring reproach on the entire profession because there is no high, ethical governing body.

The Nichols' bill, however, meets none of the present ethical needs of journalism. It is one of the most dangerous measures that has ever been proposed for the control of the press. It would take the press of Oklahoma out of the hands of newspaper men and put it under a news censorship of three partisan politicians.

Lawrence W. Murphy rightly pointed out, in Editor & Publisher last week, that we must have power of enforcement of professional standard if the profession of journalism is to be placed on its proper plane. Its standards, however, must be laid down by newspaper men themselves and enforcement must be in the hands of newspaper men as the rights of a lawyer are today in the hands of his fellow lawyers.

There is every indication that journalism is rapidly approaching a place where it will not only demand the right to set up ethical standards for all of its members, but will at the same time ask for legal machinery to enforce obedience to them in the interest of public welfare.

If the newspaper men of Oklahoma were to take leadership in drafting such an ethical code, and acquire the necessary legal right to set up its own board and empower it to enforce those standards, Editor & Publisher would be the first to applaud.

We believe that something of that kind is necessary, but it's a job for newspaper men who have the highest conception of their profession as a public service, and not job-seeking and job besieged politicians.

A DEAD HAND'S CLUTCH

COMMUNICATIONS continue to be one of the most important problems of the world to be solved if we are to have understanding among peoples and a resultant peace.

A great many false moves are being made by politicians of the school which brought about the great war, in a last stand, to save some of their fading glory by pretending to give the people easy access to facts. Rapid communication is the key to the whole situation and regardless of the protest to the contrary, instead of aiding in opening the way for the free transmission of news, the advocates of secret dealing are erecting barriers that are more dangerous than censorships.

While great damage may be done owing to the delays of censorship, we know that the truth eventually comes through. All nations have acknowledged the danger that comes from interfering with free communication, but while they profess one thing openly today, the evidence is growing that they are secretly doing another thing that is diametrically opposed to the welfare of the peoples under their government.

This question vitally interests the press, not only of this nation, but of other nations. There should be harmony in action among the press of all nations, to force a new system and international control of communications at all times that will remove all the dangers of ignorance of one people about another. The press of the world has an agency through which it can work to these ends.

The Press Congress of the World has made this the outstanding plank in its platform for world understanding. It was largely through the efforts of that organization that the United States Navy radio was made available for the transmission of news to and from the Far East.

Efforts to reap the advantage of that concession have now been thwarted by secret politics of the Japanese government. Communications in Japan are under the absolute control of the government. Instead of meeting with the hopes of those who believed a new era had been reached and that this control would be liberalized, we find it has been tightened.

A group headed by Baron Togo wishes to erect high-power radio stations in Japan to communicate with all parts of the world. The department of communications is willing that these men shall furnish the capital for the erection of the stations, but insists that upon their completion they shall pass under the control of the government. This means that the Japanese government intends to follow a communication policy that will keep the people of Japan in ignorance of the true happenings of the outside world, except in so far as the government wishes them to be known, and likewise, the outside world will be kept in ignorance of the actual desires of the real Japan.

This communication problem is not one of the Far East alone. Every nation in the world has built barriers that must be broken down. Even England, the leader among nations in the Old World in freedom of expression, is preaching one thing and doing another within the Empire. Sir Joseph Cook, High Commissioner for Australia, says that an Australian wireless commissioner has been patiently waiting in London for six months for the government's permission to erect a high-power station in England. The money is in hand for the work and no logical reason has been stated for delaying it. This thing is not confined to Australia, according to British students of this subject, but seems to be the policy adopted toward all dominions and colonies, which are demanding freedom from the present cable monopoly.

AN AMERICAN'S CREED

Compiled by Charles W. Miller,
Vicksburg, Miss.

AND John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy name; and we forbad him, because he followeth not with us. And Jesus said unto him, Forbid him not: for he that is not against us is for us.—(Luke ix: 49, 50.) If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake. But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: Conscience. I say, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? For if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks? Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God.—(I. Cor. x:27-33).

Certainly even the politicians who now have world as their plaything cannot help but realize the present policy in the face of their public announ ments to the contrary, is creating a suspicion tha having damaging effects on the trust of the pe necessary to future peace.

LONDON BOUND

NOTHING in recent years has attracted w attention among advertising men and publish than the business-like manner in which Englishmen are going after the 1924 convention the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. tainly no move has been so significant of the daw of the new day when the entire world will be marketing place of the successful business institu of tomorrow.

The English are backing this move with t money in a way that has never before been equa in a campaign for a convention. It is a high te monial to advertising's leadership as the quic means of establishing friendly trade relations.

The enthusiastic reception accorded Sir Cha Higham by the Thirty Club of London when appeared before that organization this week to re on the prospects of success of the "On to Lond movement and the detailed report of F. A. Wil Lawrenson on the outlined plans of the British entertaining their prospective guests as made to invitation committee of the A. A. C. W., and car in this issue, bid fair for the success of the movem

The British delegation that will come to Atla City in June to extend formally their invitation be one of the largest that has ever visited country; many Americans realizing the good will result from a convention overseas are alre organizing to help them. William Randolph He announces that he will send fifteen of his execut to London in 1924 in case it is selected as the vention city.

The British Empire will profit greatly by win the 1924 convention of the Associated Adverti Clubs of the World but in no way to compare to profit of the A. A. C. W. and the international t relations of the United States.

AMONG US DUPES

HARRY REICHENBACH, who found a "Vi of Stamboul" on the East Side of New Y fed a lion in the Belleclaire Hotel, and pu numerous other stunts that were dishonest and pensive to the newspapers of the country, has bro out again.

By juggling the names of Otto Kahn, the G Room Club, and a play that he has let it be kn is highly immoral and indecent, he has again been to take over the press of New York and a large of the United States, for column after column of publicity for "Reigen."

We do not know whether "Reigen" is to be tempted in the movies or whether Reichenbach deserted them for the higher drama, but what we know, however, is that, on his past record, anyth that bears his name should be killed by wire serv and newspapers alike.

There was a time when it is possible he should h been granted the hearing to which every citize entitled—he removed that doubtful obligation by coming a master faker for profit.

WALTHAM ADVERTISING

WHEN the watches of foreign makers were f ing Waltham watches out of jewelers' c that firm was compelled to turn from magaz to newspapers to save its business life; bankers, advertising men, have again taken its advertising of the newspapers and put it back into the magazi

No story written by Hammond Edward Fran for Editor & Publisher, has contained more meat sales thought than that of the Waltham watch in issue. We do not agree with him, however, that loss of $126,000 will be the newspapers'. Instead will be a good investment in educating national vertisers of the fallacy of unsound merchandis Newspapers sell goods, the product is the only pres builder.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

NEBRASKA'S dean of active newspaper editors is Mentor A. Brown, proprietor of the Kearney Daily Hub, who at seventy years of age is still active in the harness of the Hub; writing a daily editorial column, supervising all departments of his paper, and keeping an especial eye on the printing and bookbinding departments.

MENTOR A. BROWN

Mr. Brown was born February 19, 1853, at Janesville, Wis., and started his newspaper career at the age of 13 years as printer's devil on the Jefferson (Ia.) New Era. He worked on newspapers in Omaha, Nebraska City, the Council Bluffs Nonpareil and the Beatrice Express and in 1874 bought a half interest in the latter paper. Three years later he became half owner of the Fairbury (Neb.) Gazette and then became sole owner of the Beatrice Express. He established the Kearney Daily Hub on October 22, 1888.

Mr. Brown is a rock-rooted Republican but independent of partisan dictation or behests of party machine. He fought for railway regulation and prohibition and is against the civic code administration of Nebraska. He believes a newspaper's first duty is service to the community and state.

Mr. Brown's pet diversion is golf. On his 70th birthday, February 19, he prepared a carefully compiled obituary, which he sent to the newspapers and friends at Omaha.

The Haskin Information Service has more researchers in the Library of Congress than any other concern except the Government itself.

The Montreal Star Says:—

"This booklet strikes me", says the Advertising Manager of the Montreal Star, "as a very effective and practical little piece of promotion matter."

He asks for other copies of Specimen Church Ads No. 1, a sixteen-page booklet reproducing forty-four different church advertisements from all parts of the country, including small ads of country churches and full pages used on behalf of groups of churches in cities.

This booklet was produced by the Presbyterian Department of Publicity to show Presbyterian ministers interested in advertising how other churches are using paid space. Several advertising managers, having seen the booklet, have asked for additional copies for promotion purposes. The Presbyterian Publicity Department has a few copies on hand and will be glad to send a sample to advertising managers on request.

The booklet contains several illustrations of the use of interdenominational copy such as that offered by the A. A. C. of W., as Series No. 3 of Church Advertisements.

If you care for this book, "Specimen Church Ads, No. 1," ask Herbert H. Smith, 518 Witherspoon Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

We bought m the Paris American dailies. Our dope came over the telephone wires o in the morning. The telephone was payable in francs. Ruin was staring us in the face. It looked like shouldering a gun and walking post for the staff.

But you couldn't beat that captain of ours, Captain B. B. McMahon, the finest man I ever met. He didn't know an awful lot about running a newspaper, but he did know enough to leave us alone. He was a financial genius. When he took over the responsibilities of the Amaroc there was nothing but gloom in sight. When we wound up business we were on a paying basis once more.

He took a trip to Paris and got in his big lick. He arranged to get the service of the New York Herald (Paris edition) for thirty dollars a month. That was the first step. Then he wished off the cost of our German employes on the government by some dark and devious method. The eighty cents a day we were drawing was also shoved back on Uncle Sam, for eighteen men that was some item. The welfare organizations of the area were induced to pay for their publicity on a dollar basis. When the order came to pack up and go home Captain McMahon was busy on a scheme to get rid of that expensive phone bill.

It's all over now. Five of the staff are clinging around New York waiting for a chance to break into the big leagues. The rest of them are soldiering around Georgia somewhere with the 8th Infantry.

The two Polish linotype machines with the French keyboards and the German operators are now laid away in the folds of history. The Amaroc News, which for almost four years was on hand for breakfast, never missing a day, is defunct. Its death was characteristic of its whole career. It willed its fortune, some ten million marks to a charitable organization of Coblenz for the purpose of buying milk for the poor children of the city.

's the whole gang that put the Amaroc News to bed for the last time after a useful that was as full of pep at the beginning as in those first palmy days when the money e in so fast that they did not know how to spend it. IT'S HARD TO MAKE MAGAZINES PAY

Evidently Their Advertisers Think So, as They Are Hounding Newspapers to Get Tie-Up-Copy from Local Retailers

Newspapers which belong to the A. N. P. A. Bureau of Advertising are vehement in their denials that they are extending "co-operation" to magazine advertisers by soliciting "tie-up" copy from local merchants. This proposition, apparently harmless, has been made frequently in recent months by advertisers whose entire appropriation goes into magazine space. That their scheme has entrapped some newspaper publishers is certain from the clipped evidence that they show to publishers who refuse to fall for their arguments. One development has been that manufacturers who have succeeded in getting their magazine publicity tied up with retailers' copy in local newspapers have concluded that further appropriations for national advertising in newspapers is unnecessary.

Danger that thoughtless acquiescence in the plan advanced by a number of advertisers and agencies might seriously affect the standing that newspapers have achieved as the medium which is necessary to sell nationally advertised goods was realized by the Bureau of Advertising, which on March 9 sent the following letter to its members:

"Does your newspaper co-operate with exclusive magazine advertisers to get local retailers to advertise articles featured in magazines?

"If you do this kind of work, will you kindly tell us in detail just what your policy is and what your views are upon the subject?

"Magazine advertisers insist that many newspapers are willing to solicit retail merchants for advertising to back up magazine campaigns. The Bureau doubts this assertion, because it believes most of its members feel this kind of work is neither good for the newspaper nor for the retailer.

"Recently, a magazine advertiser took a double-page spread in one of the large weeklies calling upon dealers to get behind his line and asking newspapers to induce retailers to back up the magazine advertiser with newspaper copy at their own expense. Many newspapers wrote the Bureau asserting they had declined this request, but when a Bureau representative called upon the advertiser, he was shown an enormous number of clippings of dealer ads which the advertiser asserted had been developed by newspapers.

"Some newspapers that had co-operated with this advertiser in the belief the advertiser would presently use newspaper space direct, were informed that if it was as easy to get newspaper advertising from retailers as this experiment indicated, there was no need for any newspaper advertising on the part of the manufacturer.

"While the incident quoted may be an isolated case, the Bureau is anxious to be well informed on this important matter by its membership and we will be grateful to you if you will advise us of your views and your general policy."

Practical unanimity marks the replies from the publishers up to Thursday, when about 100 answers were in hand. None of them endorses the idea. Most of them state that they art too busy attending to the needs of regular advertisers and adding to their number to give time to boosting magazine-advertised specialties.

Here are a few specimen opinions gleaned from the correspondence:

"It is strictly against our policy to have our solicitors spend their time trying to sell space to strengthen exclusive national magazine campaigns."

"Such requests are met with an invitation to use newspaper advertising before such co-operation can be requested."

"We believe that newspaper publishers themselves through free publicity tie-ups with exclusive magazine advertisers, and poor solicitation, are doing more to discourage the use of newspapers in national advertising campaigns than any other cause."

"We certainly do not co-operate with exclusive magazine advertisers in any form whatsoever. In fact we give but limited co-operation to our own newspaper advertisers. We have found a tendency on the part of advertisers who request just a little more co-operation with each succeeding contract, with the result that we have limited our work to sending out such letters and heralds as the advertiser may furnish and pay for."

"If newspapers ever induce retailers in their territory to spend their own money to advertise articles that are advertised exclusively in magazines, it would give that class of publications the greatest leverage in the world to boost magazine advertising. Once convince a retailer that newspaper advertising is unnecessary because the goods he sells are advertised in national magazines, just that soon the newspaper publisher starts digging his business grave."

"All requests in connection with magazine advertising go to the waste basket."

"Our policy is to encourage dealers to advertise their service and business in general, but we know of few instances where they have made any clear profit from tie-up campaigns for which they footed the bill."

"All requests that come to this office asking us to solicit retailers for tie-up advertising for a magazine advertised article promptly go to the waste-basket."

"We have never solicited retail merchants to back up magazine campaigns. I cannot believe that publishers would do what magazine advertisers state to you and expressed in the third paragraph of your letter."

DAILIES SOLD WATCHES FOR WALTHAM

cient lines, the representative of the financial powers is reported to have at once decided to "try another agency," to get "new ideas." (Manufacturers too often have a tendency to abandon sound policies before these policies have been given a complete and fair test.

A New York agency, which leans strongly to magazine advertising—although for some clients it did use considerable newspaper space—received the account. The agency announced that "a general campaign is planned," which is understood to be a polite way of saying that magazines will be used. But one newspaper is said to be scheduled. The Waltham Watch Company has arranged to chop its prices considerably and attempt to rely on "general publications," to create demand.

According to the present outlook, the system of winning the dealer's interest and co-operation and obtaining extra Waltham advertising without cost to the manufacturer, possible only through the newspapers, has been abandoned. The intensive sales efforts of local papers has been given up for the duplication and vague response of a national magazine "splash." A newspaper advertiser which showed great promise for the future and which was only beginning to hit its stride has, for the present, it would appear, been lost to the newspapers through no fault of agency, dealer or newspaper publisher.

New York World Staff Dines

The twelfth annual dinner of the New York World took place on the morning of March 11 at the Hotel McAlpin. About 125 members and former members of the staff attended, including correspondents from Washington and nearby cities. An entertainment, in which all of the members of the editorial department received a "razzing" afforded much amusement. James E. Dever was chairman.

GATHERED AT RANDOM

THE exit of "Lightnin'" Frank Bacon from the stage of life has set to going the tongues of many old-timers out on the Pacific Coast. He is, it is to be confessed, not remembered as a virile or aggressive character. Memories cluster about his name as they cluster about a gentle spring morning of once upon a time when something more than usually pleasant came to pass.

Something in the making of newspapers attracted Bacon in the days of his youth, and he edged in at the San Jose (Cal.) Mercury as a solicitor of advertising. He did not stay a great while. The artist soul of him and the gentle disposition of him failed to hit the required note, and he ambled on his way to Napa City, where he realized a little dream and became an independent publisher. He bought the Reporter. The venture was a success, except in one particular—it didn't pay. Then he went to Mountain View, where he had been born and where everybody knew him, and started the Register. The Register did everything but produce an adequate living. He deserted it. There was really no other course for him to take. He possessed the divine afflatus all right enough, but the divine afflatus alone and unaided positively will not make a newspaper go otherwise than onto the financial rocks. Countless times has the experiment been ventured, and countless times will it be ventured, and the result has ever been and ever will be the same. Frank Bacon was not the first blithe and sanguine spirit to yield to the allurements of journalism, only to be ruthlessly kicked down the stairs. But be it said for him that he knew when he had had enough. Never after the failure of the Mountain View venture, did he go in for journalism.

Fortunately, it was not essential that he do so. He had a dream other than the one that failed to come true, and in the realization of this other dream he became an actor. It is not enough to say that he went on the stage. Once such might have been said dubiously, but the record leaves no shadow of doubt—he went on the stage and became what he already was, an actor. Wherefore we know that he had never really been a newspaper man, because he was not a newspaper man. The message which it was his destiny to give the world, and in return for which the world, tardily, showered gold and silver upon him, turned cold when put to paper.

And, reckoning the thing in dollars and cents, he failed time and time again as an actor. Old-timers up and down the Coast bear witness to the meagre financial returns brought him by his earlier efforts as a "trouper." There is still among the stuff back stage at the Grand Theater in Salem, Ore., pieces of scenery left by him because he planned to play a number of the villages where the stages were too small to permit of their use. Perhaps he forgot where he had left them. Possibly he was glad to be rid of them, as an item of expense in transportation. It may be that he forgot them entirely. It would not have been quite unlike him to have done so.

But up or down, hungry or fed, he continued to be an actor. Eventually, out of his experience, he evolved a theory. There are certain elements in human nature that are disliked by human beings. There are certain other elements they love. They want to be interested, and they want sincerity, among other things. Manifestly, people did not much care for him in the various parts he enacted. His life held nothing in that portion of it which was yet to come, unless—

"I'll make a part for myself of myself," he said.

Thus "Lightnin'" came to be, and thus the gentle, whimsical Frank Bacon came for a time to know the comfort of success.

He had but one more dream to realize now. As it was with Homer Davenport, so it was with him. He wanted to go back to the old mother town beyond the mountains to let the folks there know they had been mistaken in him and that he loved them just the same.

But this dream was not to come true. The folks out in the old home town will gather about his grave next spring, as the folks at Silverton gathered about the grave of Davenport twelve years ago, and the old paper will print a few nice things about one of America's most successful actors, and the greybeards will gather at the corner grocery after the funeral and look at one another in a puzzled way and shake their heads.

Yet as the great actor Frank Bacon was, just the same Frank Bacon that he was in the days when he tried to put the Register across at Mountain View.

Lord, send us wisdom!

D. H. TALMADGE.

A Printer of the Old School

The late JOHN F. MCCABE would have been greatly surprised three days ago if he had been told that his own name would appear in "small caps" on the editorial page of THE TIMES, whose proof he has read for more than a quarter of a century. But his name deserves to be so printed; and the regret is that he could not himself have read the proof of testimony to the long fidelity and rare ability of a printer of the old school. For Mr. MCCABE had learned his trade as a printer and worked at it for years before the linotype came. A master of the technical knowledge of that trade and an eager scholar, he went from the composing room into the proofroom. There his range of active interest widened with his years and with the greater sweep of the news, and he became an authority on many subjects that came up from day to day in the world's concern.

He had, moreover, a personality which impressed everybody who came near him. He would have been a welcome member of FRANKLIN'S junta. He "knew and felt the lure of type," and one who has known it and felt it cannot for long be entirely content away from the inky precincts of that "art which is the conserver of all arts." He was a printer to the end; and though in his later years he read the proofs instead of setting the types, the ink was always fresh upon the galley sheets that came into his hands, and it had for him a sweet-smelling savor—this black dew which, "falling on a thought, produces that which makes thousands, perhaps millions, think." If Mr. MCCABE could have seen the proof of this, he would doubtless have put queries on the margin; but those who knew him will not question what has been written.—New York Times, March 14.

Like Old Wine

An Oklahoma editor tells of an old Indian who came into his office to pay for his paper. The editor took the money; then the Indian wanted a receipt. The editor tried to talk him out of it. Mr. Indian insisted. After making it out, the editor wanted to know why he was so persistent about wanting a receipt. The Indian said: "Me die some time. Go to big gate and St. Peter ask if I been good Indian. I say yes. He say, 'Did you pay editor for paper?' I say yes. He say, 'Where is receipt?' I no have it. I have to run all over hell to find you and get receipt."—Cowden (Ill.) Reflector.

Mr. Farrelly was born in Ireland and came to this country in 1843. He founded the National News Company in 1865 and three years later became associated with the American. His home was in Harrison, N. Y., where he leaves a wife, three sons and three daughters.

Mr. Farrelly was prominent in Catholic circles. He was treasurer of the Catholic Orphan Asylum, an official of the Catholic Institute for the Blind, a member of the Catholic Club, New York Yacht Club, Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants' Association.

Requiem Mass was celebrated at St. Patrick's Cathedral by Archbishop Hayes March 13 and was attended by newspaper men from all over the metropolitan district. Frank A. Munsey, proprietor of the New York Herald and Sun, was among the pall-bearers.

Advertising Woman a Candidate

Miss Helen Hill, president of the New York League of Advertising Women, has been nominated as a candidate in the contest being conducted by the American Committee for Devastated France. As a result of this contest, seventy-five business women will go to France this summer, to carry a message of good will. Candidates will be elected on the basis of ten cents a vote, and it will require 60,000 votes or $6,000 to elect a candidate. It is expected that Miss Hill will receive the general support of the advertising fraternity in New York.

Johnstown Tribune Is Fifty

The Johnstown (Pa.) Tribune celebrated its 50th anniversary March 3, with a special section detailing its history, written by J. Campbell Murphy, managing editor. Pictures of all employes and departmental offices and machinery, with a list of long-service employes and photographs of chief executives were included, as well as pictures of the staff in years gone by.

Martinsburg (W. Va) Journal Sold

Max von Schlegell, publisher of the Martinsburg (W. Va.) Journal, has sold it to H. C. Ogden, of Wheeling, W. Va. Mr. Ogden also owns and publishes the Wheeling Evening News, Wheeling Intelligencer and the New Castle (Pa.) Herald.

A Correction

In the tabulation of the February lineage of the New York papers last week, a footnote was inadvertently omitted stating that the American's 1923 figure did not include 53,734 agate lines carried by the American weekly. This edition's lineage was a part of the February, 1922, figure.

Y BEARDSLEY LOSES $500,000 SUIT

plaint That Binghamton Press used Failure of Binghamton Herald Dismissed—Court Ruled It Legal Competition

e Court of Appeals, March 8, heard ments in the appeal of Guy W. isley, former publisher of the Bing- on Herald, from the affirmance by ppellate Division, third department, decision of Justice Albert H. Sewell ssing his complaint in an action ght against Willis Sharpe Kilmer Jerome B. Hadsell, of Binghamton, cover $500,000 damages for an al- conspiracy to destroy his business. e action was instituted in October, 1914, and alleged the defendants conspired with the late Jonas M. Kilmer, father of Willis Sharpe Kilmer, to ruin him by beginning the publication of the Binghamton Press as a competing rival. Beardsley had published several articles in the Herald to which the Kilmers objected as reflecting on them and their business, that of the manufacture of "Swamp Root," and in June, 1901, they brought an action for libel against Beardsley, which was never tried. They threatened to put Beardsley and his paper out of business and incorporated the Binghamton Press Company in January, 1904, which started the Press in April.

The complaint alleged Willis Sharpe Kilmer obtained his employes, newsboys, subscribers and advertisers by special inducements and the municipal printing by under bidding with the intent of preventing him from continuing in business. The Herald had a circulation of about 13,000 at the time, had no debts and paid a ten per cent dividend, but by reason of the competition, suspended publication in 1910. After the suspension of the Herald, Kilmer turned over the publication of the Press to Hadsell.

The Appellate Division in upholding the dismissal of the complaint, held that acts of competition were not rendered unlawful by the malicious intent of the defendants to injure the plaintiff in performing them; that the acts complained of interfered with no legel rights of the plaintiff, were not oppressive or unfair and fully justified as an exercise of the lawful right of competition.

Prize Named for Veteran Editor

The $100 annual prize given to the writer of the ten best editorials appearing in the University of Washington Daily will be named in honor of Dan Cloud, veteran Washington publisher, who died January 24, according to a decision announced February 13 by Bert Brintnall and William Horshey, alumni members of Sigma Delta Chi, professional journalism fraternity. Mr. Cloud published newspapers in Washington practically all his life, and was publisher of the Montesano Vidette until shortly before his death. Alumni and associate members of Sigma Delta Chi have donated the prize, which is awarded each spring.

HUNCHES

Managing editors and city editors are always on the lookout for news and feature ideas that can be used locally. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each hunch published under this head. The fact that the hunch is now being worked successfully in your city does not bar it from this department. Address your contributions to the HUNCH EDITOR. When they appear, clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable hunches will not be returned.

WHO is the outstanding figure in your city in any of the old or new lines of craftmanship? Not the outstanding business house in that line, but the real workman, the artist who puts his whole heart in his work—the top-notch bricklayer, woodworker, printer, blacksmith? There are lots of good human interest stories in this tip, as well as a chance to refute the argument that no workman takes individual pride in real quality any more.—R. M. F.

Who is the first citizen in your city? The Atlanta Constitution recently presented a silver loving cup to Atlanta's first citizen, who settled in that city in 1873.—J. A.

To stimulate interest in their classified section, the Cedar Rapids (Ia.) Gazette put a short story at the top center of the page, telling of want ads in old time Rome. The Romans had to walk to town where the ads were written in chalk or scratched on the walls of public buildings. Why not try this in your paper? Enclose the story in a box and change it every day.—A. R. D.

For your department "Hunches," I would suggest that each year in the cities throughout the country the police departments throw into the rivers the annual collections of pistols, knives and other weapons taken from criminals. Photographs of these just before being thrown into the water, with a resumé of the crimes and sketches of the affairs in which the weapons were involved during the year, would make a feature which could be secured annually.—C. M. L.

Investigation of soldiers' relief payrolls at city halls will reveal many interesting facts if the names of those to whom aid is extended are checked. In one city, an exposé disclosed the fact that many war veterans who were working on good jobs were unlawfully receiving aid, and that in some instances men whose names appeared on fire department and other city payrolls were illegally getting aid. This story can be handled without reflection on the deserving war veterans.—M. T.

At every factory of any size, employees leave without notice and never call for the two, three, four days' pay—perhaps more—that is due them. Find out the percentage of leaving workers who do this at a prominent local industry or industries, the nationalities which do it most and least, the season of the year it is most common, whether highly paid workers or those receiving low wages are most prone to it; in how many instances the worker applies for his balance in later years. Learn what factories are legally required to do with these uncalled for pay envelopes.—J. T. B.

"Here's a new use for the phonograph that can be made into a talked-about local story most anywhere. Any pastor will tell you that he has plenty of trouble finding someone to sing at funeral services 'at the home.' When the expected singer failed to appear at a recent home service' here, the family substituted phonograph music, playing selections that were at once appropriate and loved by the 'departed one.' Struck by the common sense of the plan a prominent minister has endorsed the idea and has expressed the intention of securing a number of high class sacred records appropriate for such services. Besides providing as good, if not better music than the available talent, the plan gets around the difficulty of securing singers. Get the expressions of your local divines."—R. L. B.

Why not change the slogan of your paper every month or so, or use a new slogan every month or so in addition to your regular one? And why not offer a monthly prize to the person sending in the best slogan that month? This stunt would impress the good qualities of your publication on the folks and would arouse a lot of interest and be a good stunt generally—F. H. W.

"A Message to You!" reads the head on a double column leaded short "editorial" written daily by some different local leader, and appearing on the front page of an Ohio newspaper. The writers are permitted to select their own subjects and some real literary gems, as well as commendable suggestions, have been forthcoming.—B. A. T.

One paper gave a party for the subscribers who have taken the paper regularly since it was started. The party not only furnished a good news story, but a feature story was run each day about one of the members of the party until the series was completed and a story based around each old-timer was used. The veteran subscribers' reminiscences included many of the banner heads of twenty-five and thirty years ago.—D. R.

Who is the youngest grandfather in your city? Who is the youngest grandmother? A contest to determine the identity of these people would arouse a lot of interest and the photos of the grandparents with their grandchildren would add greatly to the interest of the contest.—F. H. W.

A young man who lives up to his boxing ring name of Knockout was found to be the teacher of a class of boys in a Sunday school, not so long ago. Investigation revealed that he was a good teacher, too. The boys all liked him. A little prowling into the hobbies of sportsmen will reveal that many of them do regularly what a good many would never dream of them doing. A series on college professors who teach in Sunday schools may not come amiss.—J. A. W.

Hobbies are always of interest and afford excellent material for a series of daily or Sunday articles. Pick out three or four of the leading men in each profession and business in your city and get a story about their favorite sport. Divide the men into groups, such as preachers, lawyers, merchants, public officials, etc. The stories may be made more attractive by having your artists illustrate them or better still by getting a lay-out of pictures of the different sports of the men interviewed.—J. H. B.

Whenever you save money for a reader, you are making his friendship firmer. Run a series of articles on how various local housewives are effecting economies through purchases of cheaper cuts of meats; making use of odds and ends, etc. —B. A. T.

Get an interview with a piano tuner on the variety of objects which he finds in pianos, such as hairpins, chewing gum, candy, and all sorts of trinkets which fall into the interior of this particular kind of musical instrument.—L. C. P.

LIMITLESS OPPORTUNITIES IN Southern Markets

There is no other region in the world of like area equal to the SOUTH in its possibilities or limitless opportunities for merchandising your product.

The increase in diversified agricultural production, lumber, m i n e r a l s and manufacturing in the SOUTH has opened a most fertile and profitable market for advertisers of every class.

A survey of the SOUTH shows that the value of farm products increased over 200 per cent from 1910 to 1920. In value of manufactured products the SOUTH produced, in 1880, about one-eighth of the aggregate of the United States, by 1920 it produced one-sixth of the country's total. The value of minerals taken from SOUTHERN mines has grown, in forty years, from almost nothing at all, to practically one-third of the country's mineral values. This same story of progress is true in every line of endeavor throughout the SOUTH.

Never before was there such a time to establish "good will" and buying habit for advertised merchandise. The market of the S O U T H offers vast and increasing opportunities to the American manufacturer.

The SOUTHERN market is ready and anxious to buy those products which are sold under a trade mark, and has the means to pay.

The newspapers will help you if you give them a chance. In the newspapers listed below, you will find a tried and tested class of mediums for covering the vast SOUTHERN market.

Advertising Is Constantly Becoming a More Exact Science

A FEW years ago the advertiser bought his space in accordance with the ability of the salesman. He had no exact measure of circulation in most cases and there was no such thing as a definite fixed rate on sound basis of costs.

The coming of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, with its thousand members and annual audits, has reduced the factor of circulation to the sane dependability of a Federal bank examination. There are still some few who doubt the accuracy of A. B. C. audits, just as some still believe the earth is flat, but even these doubting ones are willing to concede that conditions are much better than before the existence of the A. B. C.

The matter of fixed rates for definite service is gradually adjusting itself by insistence on the part of most advertisers on a clause in their contracts that no one else shall have a lower rate for a like service.

Through reports of the Audit Bureau of Circulations we know not only the exact circulation a medium has, but where it is sold, whether circulation has been produced through schemes, and the price paid by newsdealers and subscribers. The advertiser can thus buy circulation for definite cover of desired territory, and with access to abundance of industrial and commercial data he can aim his advertising guns directly at those most likely to buy his wares.

To one with over forty years' experience in the newspaper industry this wonderful progress in the science of advertising is conclusive proof that civilization advances and that those who follow us will reap substantial harvests from our efforts toward improvement.

MAKING GOOD BUSINESS BETTER IN CHICAGO

As reflected in that infallible mirror of business in Chicago—the advertising columns of The Chicago Daily News -the "good business" of the latter half of 1922 is growing into better business in 1923.

Both in volume and in proportion of gains, advertising in The Chicago Daily News for the first two months of 923 shows a tremendous increase over the same period of 1922. This is indicative of booming business in Chicago and eveals one of its great contributing factors—liberal advertising by shrewd and experienced business getters in that iedium to which the greater part of Chicago and its suburbs looks for advertising information and guidance—The hicago Daily News.

The following statement of display advertising for the months of January and February, 1923, is striking evidence f The Daily News' leadership, among the daily newspapers of Chicago, in the following important classifications:

In these two months The Daily News gained 332,649 lines of display advertising over the same period of last year, s against a gain of 236,996 lines by The Daily Tribune, the newspaper having the next highest score.

These facts and figures confirm with emphasis the judgment of experienced advertisers in the Chicago field who oday, as for many years past, rank

More Intertype Sales Records

Intertype machine sales during January and February this year exceeded all previous records for the same period.

1922 was by far the best year in Intertype history, and 1923 is starting out even better.

Here are some of the reasons:

Flexibility — All matrices, magazines, molds, etc., in Standardized Intertypes are freely interchangeable from one machine to another. "Any job on any Intertype."

Dependability — The Intertype is designed for troul free day-after-day operation on eit "straight" or display compositi under average shop conditions.

Standardization — The owner of a Standardized Intertype can at any time convert his machine from one model into another in his own composing room.

Improvements — The Intertype carries thirty major many minor improvements. Ask y machinist or operators about them send to us for literature.

Simplicity — Elimination of over 1200 unnecessary wearing parts, including 910 escapement parts on each three-magazine machine, prevents expensive delays and reduces maintenance cost.

Durability — Even the earliest Intertypes, wh have been improved upon in ma ways, have demonstrated unusua low cost of maintenance over a per of ten years.

During the entire year of 1922, THE PRESS published more local School and College advertising than either The News or Daily Plain Dealer combined. The figures are as follows:

THE PRESS...41,829 Lines
The News..... 8,267 Lines
Plain Dealer...32,057 Lines

These advertisers are in a position to trace enrollments. That is probably why they invest the major portion of their appropriation in the leading home newspaper of Cleveland.

Incidentally, THE PRESS stands fourth in the entire country in the matter of concentrated circulation.

79% of THE PRESS' total circulation of 182,548 is distributed in Greater Cleveland, blanketing the local merchants market like the dew.

WHO SPENDS THE DAILY NEWSPAPER DOLLAR?

Publishers Are Beginning to Find Out, But Lack of Definitions Prevents Benefit of Exchanging Information—Survey Shows Paper Manufacturer Gets Largest Portion

By ARTHUR T. ROBB, JR.

AMERICAN publishers have heard so often since 1900 that they are business men that they don't listen to charge any more. They were, they it it, and many of them still are, but are reforming. They are learning. 'itness the case of the publisher of a tern group of half a dozen dailies, at the beginning of 1922 predicted in $3,000 the total profits that his ip would make during the year. That n't guess-work. It was calculation control of affairs, of the kind that Jules Verne's professor around the d in 80 days. It was engineering of kind that enables a battery of artil- to smash an unseen target ten miles y. It was scientific assaying of the me of those papers and its allotment itgo of the various departments, ac- ing to percentages determined by ex- nce and adhered to, despite pressure the men on the line for "just a little leeway" every now and then. It a triumph of budgetary control.

obably few publishers can point to a record. One New York executive ied this week at the idea that a 's profits could be definitely set aside ie budget twelve months in advance. there are few business enterprises can remain on earth without a profit, the frequent consolidations and sus- ions of the past decade are proof the newspapers are not exempt from rule.

ie basic point is that made by Mr. V. Scripps years ago that no matter good a newspaper you published, couldn't continue to do so, or to be ctor in the community unless that paper produced a profit to support after paying all its legitimate ex- es. The rule under which his many erties have operated for many years unds that 15 per cent of total re- s be set aside for profit, and that the inder be apportioned 34 per cent to editorial department, and 51 per cent ie business department. Those per- ges fitted his scheme of operation. ibly they might not apply to other shers' schemes of things, but the amental, essential part of the plan is his newspapers paid their way with thing left over for the owner, or went out of business quickly. The paper is a commercial enterprise, public service the only end it can , and if it doesn't make a profit, it serve neither its owner nor the pubents of the past nine years—high- d print paper, steadily rising costs of anical labor, equal or greater in- es in the cost of gathering news— driven this home to the publishers n they have spared from destruction. es of newspapers which struggled for years before the war have met increases in costs and more than them. They are making money to- and their publishers can at last take ions that other business men have considered part of the year's routine. can install modern machinery in ef- t and handsome buildings to replace antiquated, patched equipment that they formerly housed in ancient fire-traps. A good many of them can now look an advertiser in the eye and tell him to go to Hades when unreasonable demands are made. A good many others who used to look on State and county printing as manna from Heaven, now refuse to touch it except at their own terms.

These are all developments that have come in the life of very young men in journalism. They mean that these publishers have taken their newspapers apart, found out what made them tick, thrown away useless wheels and cogs and put together an organization which will do its work better and pay them more than an employe's wages. These assertions are not made ex cathedra. Proof is available.

A few weeks ago EDITOR & PUBLISHER told how the Inland Daily Press Association's committee on cost-accounting presented to the annual meeting an average budget based upon three years' figures submitted by members of the association. They were illuminating, for they proved that the publishers who gave the committee the benefit of their data had at last awakened to the fact that they could not be certain of a profit until they learned what operations cost and whether or not their costs could be readjusted to produce a better working organization.

Handicapped by lack of co-operation from the entire membership and by the fact that members' figures were submitted in percentages and not in dollars and cents, the committee nevertheless has worked out the following income and expense budget for the average country daily:

INCOME

	Per Cent
Advertising	70.0
Circulation	29.0
Miscellaneous	1.0

EXPENDITURES

	Per Cent
Editorial department	15.0
Advertising	7.0
Circulation	11.0
Paper and ink	12.5
Other mechanical expense	23.5
Administration	18.5
Profit	12.5

The revenue figures need no explanation except that "Miscellaneous" includes waste paper sales and other income items not to be classed as either advertising or circulation revenue.

Job department revenues and expenses are not considered.

Editorial department expenses include payroll, news service, telegraph and telephone tolls, correspondents, feature services, art, etc.

Advertising expenditures include payroll, commissions, special representatives, promotion, carfare, supplies, art and mat services.

Circulation expenses include payroll (including carriers), agency maintenance, traveling expenses, premiums, free copies, supplies, advertising, rope and twine, wrappers, expressage, postage, automobile upkeep, etc.

Paper and Ink also includes freight, cartage and storage.

Other Mechanical Expenses include payroll, gas, power, light, metal, matrices, supplies, stereotype materials, press blankets and tympans, rollers, rags, repairs, etc.

Administration includes all business office and administrative expense, as office payroll, executive salaries, depreciation, rent, stationery, postage, advertising, donations, office telephones, traveling, bad debts, insurance, taxes (but not U. S. income tax), light and water, etc.

Possibly accountants can pick these divisions to pieces. Probably many of the items under Administration should be allocated to the operating departments. Never mind trifles like that. The main fact is that the newspaper publisher is finding out what each operation in his plant costs him and how much it ought to cost him. He can juggle his items later on according to the bookkeeping system that best suits him.

Using these same divisions, another small city daily which has long worked under a budget system can be compared with the Inland average as follows:

INCOME

	Inland Average	Budgeted Daily
Advertising	70	75
Circulation	29	25
Miscellaneous	1	..
	100.00	100.00

EXPENSE

	Inland Average	Budgeted Daily
Editorial	15.0	23.0
Advertising	7.0	7.2
Circulation	11.0	9.6
Paper and Ink	12.5	12.6
Other mechanical expenses	23.5	17.5
Administration	18.5	15.1
	100.00	100.00

These divisions, of course, are purely arbitrary for the budgeted daily, which long ago graduated from swaddling clothes. It has no budget items for "Other Mechanical Expenses" or "Administration." Those expenses are apportioned among the various departments. For purposes of the above comparison, the mechanical operations of this daily are taken out of their departmental positions and arrayed beside the Inland figures. Its control methods may be responsible for its 6 per cent advantage in mechanical costs over the Inland average, for its size and income are those which would fit a great many country dailies like a tailored suit. Its managing editor is responsible that the composing room foreman gets his money's worth. The business manager keeps a similar eagle eye on the press and stereotyping cost sheets. And half of that six per cent saved goes into editorial expense, toward making the newspaper stronger. The other part goes into the owner's profits. And, while names can't be mentioned, EDITOR & PUBLISHER gives its word that these

Out of the easy life of Paris, he was off again "crisis chasing" in the Balkans. Here was romance and adventure spread to meet any man's likes.

But to the "swing man" of the European staff it was only a job that had to be done. He was a modern knight of the wagonlit trail. Today it is Athens; tomorrow Prague.

He rolls in his uncomfortable bed, but makes it possible for the folks at home to read today's news today.

Next week, EDITOR & PUBLISHER will publish the second article in the series by Otis Peabody Swift on covering Europe for the American press.

It tells of the work of the "swing man," most envied—from a distance—of all men on the other side. He is the much by-lined and advertised travelling correspondent.

RADIO MEETING ALLOTS 390-430 WAVE TO NEWSPAPER BROADCASTERS

Agreement at Hoover Conference General as to Value of Programs to Newspapers—Musicians and Composers Threaten Action to Protect Their Copyrights

By SAM BELL

(Washington Correspondent of EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22.—If there remained any doubt upon the part of newspapers in general as to the vital interest of the industry, or at least a goodly portion of it, in the development and regulation of radio communication and entertainment, it was dispelled in Washington this week at the sessions of the radio conference called by Herbert Hoover. Representatives of twelve newspapers attended the conference as delegates and the newspaper viewpoint and the needs of the newspaper broadcasting station played an important role in the agreement reached by the Conference for voluntary co-operative action designed to eliminate confusion and congestion in the air.

First the conference straightened out the wave-lengths upon which the big newspaper broadcasting stations will operate and second virtual assurance was given by the Government that ancient radio law, prohibiting the reading of communications, answers and messages, would not be interpreted as applicable to communications to newspapers clearly part of the newspaper's broadcasting program or features.

The question of infringement of copyrights on the part of broadcasters, also a subject of paramount interest to the newspapers maintaining broadcasting stations, also was injected into the conference, but no action was taken as the meeting clearly was without authority to take into consideration a problem that must be solved by agreement between the broadcasters and the owners or copyrights or by the courts.

The give and take of the meeting which called for general discussion of all branches of radio development also led to the disclosure of interesting facts regarding radio as part of newspaper operation. Apparently it was the consensus of the representatives of radio departments of newspapers that radio, as an adjunct of American journals, had come to stay. Acknowledgment of those experts that they could not estimate in dollars and cents the benefit newspapers derived from the operation of broadcasting stations, did not deter them from insisting that the radio had been a great success when tackled by a newspaper on a large scale and with a definite idea back of that newspaper's activity.

Listen to Leo Fitzpatrick of the Kansas City Star, who as one of the committee of the conference, drafted the resolutions adopted:

"The Star has made a wonderful success with its radio activities in the matter of goodwill. It has made the radio a playground, and the interest of the community is apparent from the number of letters constantly received."

Mr. Fitzpatrick told the members of the conference that the response a newspaper got from its radio activities was amazing. No other phase of a newspaper apparently developed so intimate a touch. As an illustration he spoke of "The Nighthawk Club," an organization of more than 35,000 members, most of whom take part or listen in on the Star from midnight to one in the morning. It was in defense of "The Nighthawk Club" and similar organizations that Mr. Fitzpatrick and his newspaper conferees argued for a liberal interpretation of the law against reading communication and letters exchanged.

"We get between 800 and 1,000 letters a day," he said, "and we select about 70 of the cleverest. They provide good humor and the best sort of lines. It is one of our biggest features. Then at midnight we take off the cap and cut loose. When a new member is declared eligible we ring a cow bell. We indulge in horseplay. Our stunts occupy the same place on the program as a comedian on the vaudeville stage. It is as necessary to keep an invisible audience entertained as it is a visible audience."

The educational and musical programs of the newspaper broadcasting stations also was explained by the newspaper representatives as were the costs of the undertaking to the newspapers.

Howard E. Campbell of the Detroit News estimated the cost to his paper at about $85,000, but none of the men who spoke authoritatively were inclined to believe the undertaking should be abandoned where it is being carried out on a large scale and with a definite evidence of interest to the community.

In addition to Mr. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Campbell, other newspaper representatives who attended the conference were: E. E. Plummer, Radio Digest, Chicago; John V. Hanlon, Pittsburgh Press; J. C. Muse, Dallas News; Lambden Kay, Atlanta Journal; E. L. Bragdon, New York Globe; Harold Hough, Fort-Worth Star-Telegram; W. C. Artz, San Antonio Express; Ulric Bell, Louisville Courier-Journal and Stuart Rogers, New York Evening Mail.

The proposal of the government, made by Secretary Hoover, by which some of the wave lengths now held exclusively for governmental purposes, were surrendered to broadcasters, resulted in a general reallocation of bands to meet the present situation. The wave lengths observed until the conference of this week completed its work, were allocated a year or more ago when there were only 60 broadcasting stations in the United States, instead of nearly 600 as there now are.

Wave lengths for newspaper broadcasting stations, heretofore 360 to 400 meters, were changed to 390 to 430 meters as a range assuring no confusion and well adapted to the Western, Middle Western and Eastern sections of the country.

Introduction of the question of infringement copyrights particularly on music, served to present the problem which must be dealt with in the near future by all broadcasters.

J. C. Rosenthal of New York, representing the American Society of Composers and Authors, gave notice that commercial broadcasters, large and small, would be held financially liable for the use of copyrighted songs and musical numbers from now on unless they obtain the consent of the owners of the selections.

According to Mr. Rosenthal the broadcasting of musical programs, given by great artists to between 2,000,000 and 2,500,000 persons in the United States by radio is cutting down the sale of phonograph records on which composers and writers have been receiving large royalties.

Mr. Rosenthal said the copyrighted music people asked the representatives of the broadcasters to meet with them and agree on a price for their music, but they declined to meet and therefore the music writers had fixed an arbitrary schedule of charges. He said they proposed to charge small broadcasters $200 a year and the largest ones $5,000.

The newspaper broadcasting stations, Mr. Rosenthal said, amounted to commercial stations and would be included in any action taken by the composers and writers for infringement of copyrights. Unless agreement was reached he indicated that action similar to that taken by the composers and writers against hotel and motion picture theater orchestras would be instituted and he warned that the Supreme Court had upheld the position of the composers and writers in their cases against the hotels and theater orchestras.

Enlarges Radio Department

The Chicago Daily News has dispensed with the radio section in the form of a half-sheet insert and incorporated an enlarged radio topics department, in the main body of the Saturday issue.

ZONE CHARGES APPLY ON AD PROOF SHEETS

Post Office Announces Rules and Forms Under New Law to Relieve Publishers from Using Whole Copies

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Post Office regulations under the law passed at the last session of Congress to relieve publishers from sending an entire copy of a publication to prove insertion of an advertisement, were issued this week by W. Irving Glover, third assistant postmaster general. As the result of law publishers now may send single sheets or portions of a sheet carrying the advertisement at the zone rates of postage applicable under the law to advertising portions of the newspapers. The regulations follow:

"Single sheets or portions of sheets sent to advertisers to prove the insertion of advertisements for mailing at the second-class zone rates of postage shall be enclosed in unsealed envelopes or wrappers bearing in the upper left-hand corner the name and address of the publication and the printed inscription 'advertiser's proof copy,' and in the upper right-hand corner a notice of entry as second-class matter, and shall be presented for mailing separately from complete copies.

"Such matter shall be weighed separately, fractions of pounds being computed as full pounds in all cases, postage collected and the weight entered separately on the receipts of Form No. 3539 in connection with the weight of the advertising portion of complete copies. For example, if the weight of advertising portion of complete copies going to any particular zone is 100 pounds and the weight of the sheets or portions of sheets is 2 pounds, the weights should be entered in column 6 on the line for the particular zone thus —100+2—and postage at the appropriate zone rate applied to 102 pounds.

"The weights of single sheets or portion of sheets and the postage collected thereon should be accounted for as a separate item for each publication on the line below the one on which the weights and postage for the complete copies are given in the newspapers and periodical statement sent to this office at the end of each quarter."

Chapman Leaving N. Y. World

Bertrand L. Chapman, who founded the merchandising department of the New York World, has resigned and is leaving April 14 to join Barton, Durstine & Osborn, New York advertising agency, in an executive capacity.

"Do advertising agents ever work the magazines for free space to help newspaper advertising make good?" asked Ingomar.

"My son," replied his father, "that is almost what William Collier called a 'nifty,' but my reply to your question is —not so that you could observe it with the naked eye. Newspaper advertising stands upon two substantial feet all by itself. It does not need over-shoes or skid chains by way of assistance, as is so often apparently the case with magazine advertising.

"Furthermore, if these same advertising agents tried to get magazines to print a lot of free stuff in support of a newspaper campaign, they would be spanked, put to bed and shot at sunrise by the magazine gentlemen who have been known to have somewhat positive convictions in dealing with types of advertising agents."

"Well," said Ingomar, "this beats my time and then some. Why don't the newspaper do something to stop this impudent graft? Are they a lot of lumbbells?"

"Oh," replied his father, "don't misunderstand me. Newspapers have done a lot and will do a lot more to put the skids under the free publicity nuisance and don't think for one minute that all newspapers fall for it today. Every regular press agent, as well as those volunteers who are working at the advertising agency business on the side, knows quite well that he can't break into a tremendous number of newspaper offices with a shipload of jimmies and some TNT. You can't say that all newspapers are boobs on this program any more than you can class all advertising agents as free publicity chasers. I am glad to say there are many agents who never stoop to these hard-boiled tactics. These are the agents who are trying to give their clients an actual run for their money and are thinking about making good for them just as much as they think about profits for themselves.

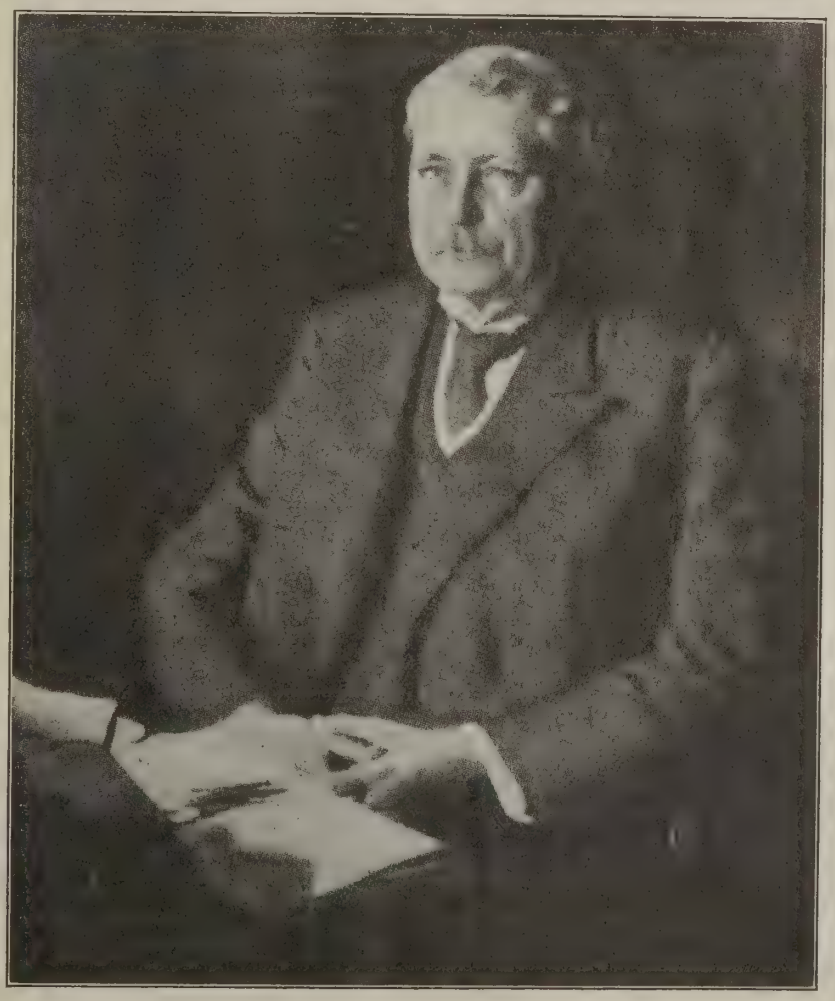
"But the trouble is that in many newspaper shops the free publicity gems land on the desk of an editor who is trying to figure out a golf score or has his mind some place other than on his job. This editor, who happens to have one foot off first base and is suffering momentarily from transmigration of the mind, does not always see the axe that is buried in the beautifully printed article which has been mailed to him—the phoney advertising axe which is to be sharpened on the newspaper's grindstone at the publisher's expense. It is needless to say this lapse of the editorial thinking process is the delight of space grafters."

"It strikes me," was Ingomar's comment, "that you can't blame the advertising agency birds of whom you speak for grabbing something for nothing when it is lying around loose."

"Of course you can't," was his father's comment, "but you certainly can blame them for trying to make their clients believe they are doing an efficient advertising job when, as a matter of fact, they are throwing a raw bluff and have their eye chiefly upon the net coin that accrues to themselves."

"Don't the advertisers ever get wise to this situation?"

"They do, or they perish. It is usually the new advertiser who is willing to pay high for his experience who falls for press-agenting agents. Occasionally a looney advertiser tries the racket, thinking to cut down on his appropriation, but he invariably stops before the booby-hatch garners him."



"What would happen if the advertisers who seem to like this free bunk were to learn something about advertising?"

"Why just the same thing that would happen if some editors got a little cultivation above the ears about press agentry: The advertiser would save a lot of time, the newspapers would save real money and every regular advertising agent would prosper in accordance with his abilities."

"Would the magazines then go out of business as advertising mediums?"

"Not on your life! They would become better mediums because they would saw wood in their own yard and go after the kind of advertising on which they can make good by themselves."

FATHER OF WASHINGTON LIBRARY

A LIFE size portrait of Theodore Williams Noyes, editor of the Washington Star, was recently presented to the Public Library of the District of Columbia in recognition of Mr. Noyes' public service rendered as president of the library trustees since 1896. Mr. Noyes is the father of the Public Library movement in Washington, and it seemed appropriate to a group of his friends and co-workers that a portrait of him, by a competent artist, should be painted and hung on the walls of the central library building. They carried out their plans and the picture was formally presented and accepted at public exercises in the Library Building.

IN DAYS WHEN A BEAT WAS THE THING, MORSE PLAYED A DOUBLE PART

Death of Andrew S. McSwigan Recalls Feats of the Days When He Was Reporter and Getting the News Regardless of Obstacles Was the Rule

By WILLIAM P. BEAZELL

HONOR has long been paid to the men who came to editorial chairs from the printer's case. Not enough by half has been said of those who were graduated from the telegrapher's key. Yet American journalism owes a great debt to these latter—a debt that ought to be acknowledged, even if it may never be paid.

Not long ago there died in Pittsburgh one of these telegrapher-editors—Andrew S. McSwigan. His death itself did not figure extensively in the news, but the filing of his will was "A" stuff, because of the touching, unaffected tribute he paid his wife in that document. It won for McSwigan's memory a country-wide recognition that he well deserved, and one that might well have come to him for other attributes.

McSwigan was a thoroughly good reporter; an even better reporter than he was an editor, for the sufficient reason that it was a reporter he wanted to be. He continued to be a thoroughly good reporter long after he left the Pittsburgh Dispatch and established one of the first of the now long line of "one man" news bureaus. It was his reporter's instinct that enabled him to make a more than substantial fortune in the ice-rink and amusement part enterprises to which he devoted his last years.

But this is not an obituary notice of McSwigan. It is an account of two conspicuous instances in which McSwigan, the reporter, would have had a luckless time of it if it had not been for McSwigan, the telegrapher.

The Johnstown Flood will long remain one of the news-gathering classics of our newspaper history, because of the immense difficulties that stood in the way of getting the news out, even after the correspondents had been able to fight their way into the city. Practically every telegraph line within five miles of Johnstown was carried out by the flood. Those that did remain were promptly reserved for the use of the relief authorities and of the Pennsylvania Railroad, without whose restored operation relief would have been impossible.

Only the barest bulletins were got out of Johnstown during the first twenty-four hours after the flood. There were not even towns nearby where service could be had, for Johnstown, it will be recalled, lay in the mountains with only wilderness to the North and South; with the barrier of the crest of the Alleghanies to the East and with the path of the flood itself to the west.

McSwigan was of the very vanguard of the correspondents in Johnstown. Because he had been a telegrapher he had an acute appreciation of the fact that getting the news would be but the smaller part of his job. The first thing he did, therefore, was to start a hunt for a "live" wire out of the city. So far as appearances went, there was but one, and that was being held strictly for the authorities. Even if there were others that were not broken no one knew whether operators could be found for them.

McSwigan found a wire, and proceeded to keep his discovery to himself. He set out then to get his news, and when he had it he didn't bother about writing it—he sat down at his own private wire and composed his story as he dot-and-dashed it off. With one exception, this was the first orderly or even partially complete story sent out from Johnstown.

The exception was that sent by Eugene L. Connelly, long with the Leader, but for the past fifteen years with the Harry Davis Amusement Enterprises. Connelly, too, had been a telegrapher. He, too, set out to find his own wire, and succeeded in a block signal tower six miles down the Conemaugh Valley. The tower stood on a little island of its own, and to reach it Connelly had to make his way through a long stretch of water, mud and debris. From this tower he sent his story, and for three or four days thereafter did the same thing.

Three years after the Johnstown flood, McSwigan achieved an even more distinctive feat. The Homestead strike was impending, and a final decision was to be reached by officials of the Carnegie Steel Company at a meeting at the Edgar Thomson plant in Braddock.

Under all possible precaution for secrecy, this meeting was held on the second floor of a frame office building. When it was over the reporters were told that anything that could be said would be given out at the general offices in Pittsburgh. "Nothing," was the announcement there, but the following morning the Dispatch declared not only that the company would fight, but it used the very language of the decision reached at the Braddock meeting.

It would be hard to say whether the rage over this beat was greater in the offices of the other Pittsburgh papers or in the offices of the Carnegie Company. An air of immense innocence marked McSwigan's face as he went again to Braddock the next day. It lasted until he reached the foot of the flight of stairs that led to the room where the momentous conference had been held.

Just as McSwigan reached the foot of these stairs Capt. "Bill" Jones (as great if not as renowned a steel man as the country ever produced) came to the top of them. With a roar he leaped to the bottom and caught McSwigan by the shoulders, crying:

"Damn it, I ought to have remembered that you used to be an operator!"

That was the secret of McSwigan's beat—standing a good thirty feet away and clear outside the building, he had "read" the report of the meeting's decision as it was telegraphed to the general offices in Pittsburgh.

Curiously enough, there is another Connelly story to set down beside this one. Working for the Leader, Connelly was also correspondent for the Boston Globe. Each afternoon at 5 o'clock during the Homestead strike he called it by telephone and turned in his report—the first systematic use of the long-distance telephone by a newspaper.

One other telegrapher-reporter of Pittsburgh comes to mind, Tensard De Wolf, now Magistrate of the Morals Court there. When Mabel McKinley, niece of President McKinley, was married at Somerset, Pa., De Wolf was sent up by the Leader. A difference of opinion with the Philadelphia reporters led them to decide to "get" the Pittsburgher, and, with many instructions to the manager of the telegraph office to protect it from their enemy, they filed a story on which the entire group had worked.

De Wolf filed his own story, and, suspecting that something was afo down by the stove. One of the P phians was told off to stand gua it should be too late for De Wol anything, even should he be able access to the copy. After three hours, De Wolf relented and said Philadelphian:

"That's a good story still for yo sent it in yesterday."

"You don't know what the st scoffed the other.

"Oh, yes, I do," returned De and proceeded to prove it. "You interested in knowing that I ca Morse even better than I can send

OHIO STATE STUDENTS ADOPT CODE FOR NEWSPAPERS AND THEIR STAFFS

STUDENTS of the department of journalism, Ohio State University, recently drafted and adopted this code of ethics for newspapers and newspaper men. It was prepared under the supervision of Prof. Joseph S. Myers, head of the department, and its text follows:

PREAMBLE—Believing that the newspaper is a molder of character and thought, rather than a mere purveyor of colorless and lifeless facts; that it is a force which influences its readers in a positive manner either for good or for evil; that the course of local, State and national affairs is determined largely by the policy adopted by the press; and believing that human progress itself is dependent upon the progress of a better journalism, we adopt this code of ethics which shall guide us in our profession.

SERVICE—The main purpose of the newspaper in the printing of facts and editorial opinions should be to render a public service by printing all news fit to print, criticism of evils and a constant advocacy of the good things of life. Fearless in its stand for good, it should never falter in its attacks on movements that are unjust or harmful to mankind.

TRUTH—Truth should characterize the newspaper in all its dealings. This quality may be attained only by unflagging diligence, eternal vigilance and the elimination of all signs of inefficiency. Newspapers should investigate carefully those statements which arouse suspicion or doubt.

INJUSTICE AND ERROR—A newspaper shall strive to exclude from its columns any matter which will cause needless suffering or anxiety. When anything unjust or erroneous is printed, adequate correction of the mistake and full acknowledgement of the error should be published immediately.

GIVING BOTH SIDES—Since the newspaper is organized to disseminate news, all essential, decent facts on both sides of any article should be printed. On the occasions when opinions may be expressed, they should be unbiased and unprejudiced. Partisanship should not be tolerated.

MALICE—A newspaper should not print anything of a malicious nature. Owing to its power in the community, the press may cause incalculable harm by printing matter tending to annoy or injure unnecessarily. It should never intentionally do harm or cause misfortune.

COLORING—Coloring the news means the injection of untruths or exaggerations into the news. Inasmuch as unbiased truth is an essential of journalism, a newspaper should not distort, exaggerate or color the news. The editorials may express the paper's policy, but the news columns should be uncolored.

KEEPING CONFIDENCE—A newspaper man should never violate a confidence. Betrayal of confidential information will result in loss of faith, loss of friends, loss of news sources. News imparted to a reporter with the injunction "don't publish" should be regarded as sacred, the reporter telling no one but a superior.

TRIVIALITY—A newspaper should avoid the practice of allotting too much space to articles of little value. Accounts of events should contain all the news without exaggeration. Feature stories and illustrations should be carefully selected and judiciously used both in consideration of material and position.

ADVERTISING AND CIRCULATION—Honesty in advertising and circulation is just as essential as honesty in the editorial and news columns. The paper which knowingly prints dishonest advertising is party to fraud. A publisher who misrepresents the circulation of his paper is guilty of obtaining money under false pretense.

INVASION OF PRIVACY—Private rights should not be needlessly invaded by newspapers in presenting news. Crime and other evil must be exposed, but it is not necessary to put into the news names that have not a direct connection with the evil.

VENALITY—The newspaper should refuse to sacrifice its independence, power and individuality in exchange for bribes or contracts which will destroy the freedom of the press. No newspaper worker should be motivated by any other influences but the desire to give his unbiased efforts to the newspaper.

An old hand press, one page size, was found in a dark corner of the basement. Light was furnished by a lantern and all members of the staff had a hand in turning the crank. The normal circulation of the Chronicle is about 14,000. Only 150 copies were run off this issue. They were posted about the city and the people gathered around to read as in the days of ancient Rome.

CENTURY-OLD BRITISH HOUSE TUMBLES THROUGH ADVERTISING BLUNDER

Failure to Capitalize Name That Was World Famous Brings Day & Martin, Blacking Pioneers, to Verge of Ruin and Makes Advertising Reconstruction Necessary

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

AWAY back, when Charles Dickens was a boy, there stood in the southeast of London a house whose wares were known the length and breadth of the universe. In those days advertising was of a vastly different character; it was not possible to create a market by the use of the newspaper press. It was never contemplated that men and women could be induced by the printed word in argument form to establish or change a habit.

Advertising, as viewed then by the comparative few who practiced it, was almost entirely a matter of making a big noise, planting the name of the product where it could be seen by the greatest number of people, and renewing contracts each year. It was a case of the first man to get in with a shout doing the big share of the business.

Such were the principles on which was founded the century-old blacking house of Day & Martin, Ltd., and they were probably the greatest advertisers in their epoch. They appreciated the need for advertising in a fashion that was years before its time. They knew the value of legend and romance as a means of creating interest, and permitted all sorts of stories to circulate concerning their enterprise. One concerned the origin of the blacking itself—that Mr. Day or Mr. Martin befriended a crippled, starving soldier, who in gratitude presented him with the recipe for water-blacking. Another was that the company had arranged to paint an advertisement of Day & Martin's blacking on the side of the Pyramids in Egypt. They were advertisers—be sure of that.

The mention of Charles Dickens recalls the fact that the famous author as a lad actually worked in the Day & Martin factory—history says as a washer of bottles. One cannot but reflect what a wonderful advertising manager (had such individuals existed in those days) the concern overlooked in the person of the imaginative Dickens.

The Day & Martin advertising carried their product on an impregnable pinnacle well into the nineties of last century. Seemingly subject only to the revision of advertising ways and means to suit the advancing times, the house could go on forever.

But, in the words of R. O. Burlison, the managing director of the firm, a small cloud appeared on the horizon—the introduction of the present-day wax boot polish. Mr. Burlison admits that American shoe production played its part in this, for he says that the reason why polish of this kind was required was that the Americans had introduced an entire change in the tanning of leathers, viz., chrome tanning, and this, being a smooth, hard surface leather, needed a different type of cleaner from either the old rough leather for which paste blacking was used, or the high-grade calf leather for which liquid blacking was used.

The directorate of Day & Martin ignored the invader. It could never replace the old-established water blacking. It could never dim the lustre of the name Day & Martin.

But the public took another view. It found the wax polish easier to apply, cleaner to handle, and more economical in use. Gradually the sales of Day & Martin waned as the other waxed. Still it was considered that the fog would lift and nothing was done until the machinery began to slow and idle. Then it was discovered that if they were to hold any market at all, Day & Martin must produce a polish to meet the new competition.

This was done, but in the marketing a fatal mistake was made. It was not failure to advertise as such, but the failure to realize that the greatest advertisement of all was the name Day & Martin. The new polishes when launched were christened "just out"—a meaningless title that necessitated the creation of a new public from a new starting point. All the hundred years' cumulative advertising value of the name Day & Martin was thrown away. Soon this mistake was realized, and they endeavored to retrieve their position by changing the name to "Daymar." This did not help; it had no more meaning and no significance. The public had changed its habit, and in the shortness of its memory, the name of Day & Martin had faded away.

The position stands so today. This great house, a part of Britain's commercial history, its appealing to its shareholders to save it from complete wreck, to restore its ancient fortune, all that is necessary being, according to Mr. Burlison himself, efficient management, efficient distribution, and a sound advertising policy to knock out of the heads of the British public the idea that Day & Martin means "Blacking" and make them understand that it stands for "Boot Polish."

HOUSTON WANTS CONVENTION

Will Be Backed by 500 Texans at A. A. C. W. Meeting in Atlantic City

SAN ANTONIO, Tex., March 17.—Directors of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the Tenth District, comprising Texas, Arizona, New Mexico and Louisiana, met this week to formulate plans to attend the national convention at Atlantic City, N. J., June 7.

It is planned to have 500 men attend the convention with a view to bringing the 1924 convention to Texas, probably Houston. It is proposed to have the delegates at this gathering make a tour of the State, taking in San Antonio, Dallas, Waco, Fort Worth and other cities. Only one national conference has been held in Texas—at Dallas in 1912.

A special train will leave Dallas May 31. The Texas delegates will be joined by members of the national association at various points.

Free Press Denies Sale Rumor

The Detroit Free Press in its issue of March 18 printed a front-page box denying emphatically reports that it is for sale, or about to be sold. "These whole-cloth lies," it stated, "originated with and have been pushed by a Detroit newspaper, publishing afternoon and Sunday editions. Their dishonest purpose is to induce news agencies and salesmen to fall away from this paper."

NEW YORK DRY GOODS STORE STRIKE LAST MONTH KILLED 100,000 LINES

FOREIGN advertising continued increasing its monthly totals over 1922 in New York papers in February, according to detailed analysis compiled by the New York Evening Post. Want advertising also shows healthy gains. Local display advertising in morning and Sunday papers was affected to the extent of about 100,000 lines, as was expected, by the strike of eleven department stores against an increase in the Times' rates, but the evening papers showed an increase in this class of business of over 200,000 lines. The tabulated analysis follows:

HOLLAND WILL AC[CEPT] RENOMINATION

If Associated Advertising Clubs [Ask] Him to Continue in Office, [He] Will Not Refuse—Will No[t] Make Campaign

KANSAS CITY, March 19.—[It] that Lou E. Holland of Kansa[s] would decline to serve another t[erm] president of the Associated Adv[ertising] Clubs of the World, which office [he] holds, were set at rest today wh[en] Holland authorized EDITOR & PUB[LISHER] to publish the following statement:

"The by-laws of the A. A. C. W. [pro]vide for the selection of a presi[dent] the annual convention. The delega[tes] attendance at Atlantic City in Ju[ne] know whether or not their best in[terests] have been served during my admi[nis]tion. Should they desire, I will [be] re-election and give the associati[on] best I have.

"Regarding reports to the effe[ct] I have found the presidency a [great] financial burden: It is a pleasu[re] I believe the duty of right thinkin[g] to encourage principle in busine[ss] am still discounting my bills and fi[nd] indications will continue to do [so] regret neither time nor money s[pent] serving the A. A. C. W."

Mr. Holland said he would m[ake] formal announcement of his ca[n]didacy for re-election nor will he con[duct] political campaign of any kind. I [will] go before the Atlantic City con[vention] with a report of what he has d[one] carrying out the pledge of a "b[usiness] administration" on which he was [elected] last year in Milwaukee. If, on w[hich] has been able to do, the delegates [see fit] to return him to office, Mr. Holla[nd] he will willingly accept the respo[nsibili]ties again and give his best to the [office].

When rumors that he had fou[nd] presidency of the A. A. C. W. t[oo] pensive for him to continue were b[rought] to Mr. Holland's attention he sm[iled] said: "If the presidency were t[o] me $10,000 a year, I wouldn't [have] missed it for three times that a[mount]. The experiences I have had, the [friend]ships I have made and having a [part] the good work the A. A. C. W. a[nd] ing for better business are wel[l] priceless to any man favored with [the] tion to the office I am now privile[ged] hold."

A campaign for the election of [Mr.] Wilson-Lawrenson of New York, [chair]man of the committee appointed [to] vestigate the feasibility of meeti[ng] London in 1924, has been launch[ed] friends of Mr. Wilson-Lawrenson [who] feel that his friendships overseas [can] be capitalized to the advantage [of] advertising interests of America.

Mr. Holland said he as presid[ent] the A. A. C. W., is not in a posit[ion] make any recommendation on whe[re] 1924 convention should be held. I[t] pointed a committee, of which [Mr.] Wilson-Lawrenson is chairman, t[o] vestigate possibilities of accepting [Lon]don's invitation. The report was [pub]lished in EDITOR & PUBLISHER [last] week. It will rest with the del[egates] at Atlantic City to decide what plac[e] be in the best interests of the organiz[ation].

THE COPY DESK DEMANDS ITS PLACE IN THE SUN

Not All Copyreaders Do Their Cutting with an Axe, Says One of Their Number—Most Important Factor in Good Newspaper Organization

By ORVILLE A. WELSH

"WHAT do you do on the Tribune?" asks the uninitiate friend of the old (in experience, anyway) newspaper man.

"Copyreader" is the brief reply, the "journalist" realizing his inability to explain his job satisfactorily to his friend.

"Ah-h!" breathes the uninitiate, in a disillusioned tone. "Reading proof, eh?"

Sometimes he only thinks this, and out of sympathy for the newspaper man remains silent.

For it is a fact that no department of a newspaper is as little known to and understood by the general public as the much-maligned copy desk. The very name seems to imply a sort of drop-light, ledger slavery. In England they do things a little better. Men who edit copy for publication are called sub-editors. In this country they suffer under the inglorious cognomen of copyreaders.

Even in a newspaper office itself, the copy desk is commonly held in scorn by the star reporters and those functionaries with various editorial handles to their titles. Nevertheless the copy desk is undoubtedly the most important unit of the editorial end of the paper, and is so regarded by most high executives.

But does anyone remember any newspaper story having been written around a copy desk? No, several thousand times no! It is the reporters who have grabbed all the fictional glory.

And yet what would the best reporter's story be without skilful handling on the copy desk? Why, if it were not attractively headlined, no one would read it at all. And if the little quirks in copy were not ironed out carefully, the reporter would get an irreparable black eye. But with good copyreading, the writer of the story gets credit. If there is anything wrong, the copyreader is at fault.

Surely the time has passed when the copy desk should be disparaged. Nowadays a man is not put on the copy desk when he has failed as a reporter, but is only given a chance to "break in" on the desk as a reward of merit. Yet the salaries of copyreaders are still miserably low as compared with those of star reporters.

As a result the standards of metropolitan newspaper copy desks have fallen, and papers are, in many cities at least, being more poorly edited than of yore. For this the newspapers have only themselves to blame.

Vive la copy desk! And doubly vive the really good, trained copyreader.

A copyreader must be above all things an expert. He is required to do a tremendously wider range of reading than a mere reporter. He must know at a glance whether the reporter is hitting the high spots or not, whether the given street number is likely to be correct, whether two given thoroughfares really do intersect, whether this or that technical term used by the reporter is correct, whether the Boer War really started in 1898 or 1899. He must be all things to all reporters.

The average blasé reporter regards the copyreader in as much the same light as the staff of a certain small city morning paper used to regard the night editor. This man, being very busy and having the job of checking up on the reporters' own headlines, used to content himself with cutting off the last paragraph of every piece of copy, every story, and letting it go at that. So the reporters used always to write one extra and exceedingly unimportant paragraph.

The old Philadelphia Press, lamented by thousands of good newspaper men who have passed through its payrolls, was a great training school for copyreaders. There the desk was given its proper dignity.

A reporter would no more have thought of going up to the Press copy desk and helping himself to shears or pastepot than he would have thought of walking clear to Broad street, six or seven blocks, to cash his pay order with a perfectly obliging saloonkeeper right across the street. No, indeed, that was a COPY DESK.

Not often did a reporter reach that eminence in which he dared to approach the desk at all without being summoned. Reporters that did that were among the élite. Nowadays reporters have no respect at all for the copyreader's tools, and woe betide him if he leave them on his desk while at lunch. For he may as well return singing "Goodby, Forever."

We knew a reporter who got properly bawled out for asking a copyreader for a match. The veteran, who was the dean of the desk, thus replied:

"You have the whole city of Philadelphia from which to get matches. This desk is right here from 6 to 2, matches or no matches."

But the dean was the most loved man in the room. When he had time, he used to call a cub reporter over and point out errors in his copy. And incidentally to give the cub a little encouragement.

The dean sat next a very silent man for months. This man had another peculiarity, besides silence. He never carried a knife, and used to sharpen his soft-lead, paper pencils with his shears. So one night the dean made him a present of a fine, pearl-handled knife.

Another old-timer on this desk was an expert on Philadelphia society. He knew the genealogies of every family living within social distance of Rittenhouse Square. No possible error of initials could get by him.

Every man on that desk was a specialist. When any cuts were to be made in stories in the composing room, the copyreader of that story was sent for, as it was assumed that only he could trim the story properly. Nowadays they just leave on the stone what they can't get into the form.

As a consequence the Press, despite its shortcomings, and they were no doubt many, was one of the best-edited papers in the Quaker City. Its passing during the war, or shortly afterward, caused repining by hundreds of newspaper men far from Philadelphia who remembered their service on the old sheet. An ex-Press banquet, held a year or so ago, was very largely attended. Traditions!

There was that Election Night in 1916 when the election of Justice Hughes to the Presidency seemed as certain as almost anything in this world, and in fact was conceded by such Democratic journals in the East as the New York World. But old Judge Wells at 11 o'clock came to the copy desk and said:

"Well, gentlemen, the Press has never gone on an election result yet, and I think we will leave this one in doubt till we hear from California."

And the veteran editor's judgment was amply vindicated.

The worst thing about the trade of a copyreader is that everywhere he goes he has to learn "style" all over again. The House of Representatives is capitalized in one paper, and not in another; the Governor in the Argus becomes Gov. Smith in the News. Also rules of headline writing vary in every office. Each paper has a different set of barred words, which the copyreader doesn't usually find out about till he has tried to use them. Words are usually barred because they have been used so often in headlines as to become bromidic. Examples are grill, nab, O.K., hit (verb), etc., all mighty handy to fit into a head with little count.

Negro in one paper becomes colored in another, on penalty of discharge. Even the word Jew is frequently banned.

A frequent ban is on the use of forms of the verb "to be," such as "is killed," while nearly all papers now dislike top lines of heads ending in prepositions.

Generally speaking the tendency on Eastern papers is to capitalize, while in the West everything goes lower case, even congress, and often the president himself.

There used to be a marked difference between East and West in headlines starting with verbs. For instance, even in the New York Times, under the headline, "Say Republicans Sure of Victory," there might be a bank, as follows, "State Chairman Predicts, etc." In the West the noun cannot be implied, but must lead the first bank, and must agree in number with the verb, for instance, "State Leaders Predict, etc."

Few Eastern newspapers have style books, and the copyreader gropes his way. The style book is a Western proposition, and the most weighty one the writer has ever seen is that used by the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

This style book tells the new copyreader almost every conceivable form preferred. Double-jointed words are cited. Style used to be adhered to religiously. In fact the writer was once thrown back a head containing the word "trolley." There was no ban against it, but the style book, compiled years before, said nothing but street-car. Traditions!

The war, though, by driving the good copyreaders into other occupations or into the service broke down these traditions, and tore a gap in the "style" of all publications. For the traditions of a paper are something that cannot be acquired by a new man overnight, or rather it used not to be so.

This probably is one of the elements entering into the trend toward standardization of American press since the war.

With the exception of the Cincinnati Enquirer, the Boston Transcript, and one or two other papers, all American dailies have the same style of headline, varied in the cases of the New York Tribune and Evening Post by the use of lower case letters throughout, a scarcely noticeable variation. The make-up of papers throughout the country is the same, their news and features almost identical. That any variation from this standardization has a great appeal is evidenced by the tremendous growth in circulation experienced by the New York Daily News.

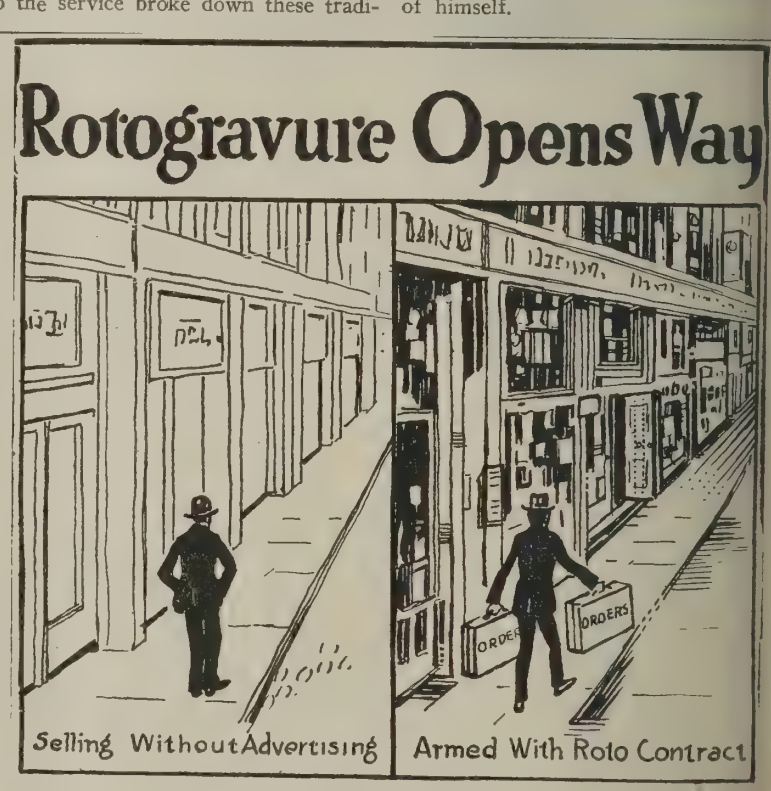
The famous "Jerked to Jesus" headline over the story of a hanging was an example of brilliant, if suggestive copy reading. The head, however, might not be regarded as slightly editorial.



* * *

What is a copy desk without its book of horrible headline examples? There was when copyreaders used to vie with each other in putting a head over which would qualify for this book.

"OHIO FIRST"

—means just what it says.

The man who has studied business conditions knows that Ohio offers a rich field for those who have something worth while to sell.

It has producing farms, busy factories, splendid hardwood forests, rich petroleum, coal and natural gas fields. It has a population of 5,759,394 or 141.4 inhabitants per square mile.

Ohio's Purchasing Power Makes It the First Logical Market

Ohio has 16,125 factories or an average of one factory for every 2.5 square miles of territory. The yearly payroll of Ohio factories amounts to $944,651,000.

There are 23,515,000 acres of farm land, mostly improved. Although this is about 90% of the state's area, yet 63.8% of the population lives in incorporated towns and villages, showing the intensity of Ohio's population.

Ohio farms average 91.6 acres and are worth $3,095,666,336. Nearly 180,000 farms are owned by their operators. Think what this means to the maker of farm implements.

Ohio is fifth in electric railway mileage. It is thirty-fifth in area and fourth in population.

CLASSIFIED CAN BE SOLD IN ONE CALL BY COMMITTING PROSPECT AT START

Salesman Whose First Question Not Only Interests His Customer, But Ties Him Up to Its Conclusion, Saves Time and Makes Lineage

By C. L. PERKINS

Executive Secretary, Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers

"IT was from a talk with a salesman of securities that I gained a very valuable slant on selling classified," said one solicitor who ranks first in a group of seventeen. "I had been plodding along for months working conscientiously but not getting brilliant results, and this chap opened up vast vistas which proved to be most valuable. I'll tell you what he said:

"'I've been trained in the one-call system in selling securities and there's no reason the same principle shouldn't apply to your problem, classified space. The old idea of persistence is wrong: altogether wrong. It makes the salesman argue subconsciously, "Well, I don't suppose I'll sell him today, but I shall some time." When I enter a prospect's office I say, Mr. Jones, I am representing an enterprise which will yield its investors at least 15 per cent a year with practically no risk, I do not wish to consume your time nor my own unless you are in a position to invest at least $500. Pardon my apparent presumption, Mr. Jones, but won't you tell me frankly if you are now in a position to invest at least that sum in case I prove my proposition to your complete satisfaction. If I do, naturally you'll wish to join us. If not, you won't. But it must be settled pro and con this morning in your office. Will you invest, Mr. Jones, if, after a thorough exposition of my proposition you agree with my assertion that it will pay you at least 15 per cent annually with no risk?'

"'Some' say "No." Then I bid them good bye. Others say "Yes," believing that I can not prove my case. Those are the ones I sell in one call. No man could ever be sold any promotion project in one call, however, unless he had committed himself beforehand through the method I've sketched.'

"That was what the security man told me," continued the classified salesman, "and I promptly saw its application to my own problem. Next day I called on a real estate man whom I could never quite close. He was a born procrastinator.

"'Good morning, Mr. Belden, I've been wasting a lot of your time and a lot of mine on this question of using the Globe,' I opened. 'I have some new and interesting data to submit, but before I go into it I want to know if you'll agree to this proposal. If I convince you this morning beyond question of a doubt that for every dollar you spend in the Globe you will earn at least 15 per cent dividends, will you sign an order for a 30-time contract this morning; you're to be the doctor.' What could he say but 'Yes'?

IT has often been stated in these columns that the uses of Want-ads are infinite. However, they have never been advocated as a method of organizing hold-up men. Yet the following advertisement appeared in a metropolitan paper recently:

"STICKUP MAN—Experienced for barrel truck."

All reports indicate that this was a composing room error. The copy should have read "Pickup man."

ADVERTISING YOUR WARES IN CHINA MORE THAN SPACE-BUYING JOB

Circulation Figures Mean Little but Copy Which Is Much Neglect—Today Is the Big Factor in Making Sales

By CHUNG SHU KWEI

EDITORIAL NOTE.—Mr. Kwei is editor of the Chinese Students' Monthly. He is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin and was formerly on the staff of the Milwaukee Journal and prior to that manager of the China Press Bureau, Washington.

AMERICAN firms which plan to advertise or are advertising in newspapers in China should satisfy themselves in the outset with definite answers to two fundamental questions: Which is the more effective advertising medium, the foreign press, or the native? What is the most effective way of writing the copy?

CHUNG SHU KWEI

A third question which is the most fundamental is with reference to the demand for the goods or service a particular firm expects to render or is rendering. This phase of the subject will not be touched upon, as no firm will start advertising without making sure of the existence of a particular demand.

The first question as to the effectiveness as advertising medium of the foreign press versus the native press can be answered in the same way as in America. The answer depends upon the class of people to whom the advertisements are intended to appeal. The native press undoubtedly reaches a hundred times more people than the foreign press, but the masses in China are not in great need of foreign goods and have a very small purchasing power. Most of those who have use for western articles and are able to pay can read one foreign language at least, and the rest who know nothing but Chinese are in constant touch with and sometimes dependent for the purchase of accidental products upon those who read English, or some other language.

It is also the so-called upper class of people who introduce new foreign goods into use in China. They may be compared to the society and fashion leaders in this country. On the other hand, it will be seen that those Chinese who read English naturally can read their own vernacular and that consequently advertising in the native press will be as effective as in the foreign press. Only three points are in favor of the foreign press. The psychological element of pride which comes to those who know foreign languages prompts them to talk about foreign products of which others may have no knowledge, and the fact that in the foreign press there are fewer native advertisements makes that medium the better field for concentrated advertising. Lastly, the foreign press goes to the foreign population which cannot be otherwise reached, through newspapers.

The matter of circulation is not a serious factor in advertising in both native and foreign presses. Newspapers in China are literally passed from door to door, and the numerical report of circulation is no test of the value of a paper as an advertising medium. This is especially true of the foreign press which in the nature of things can have but a limited circulation.

This point is well illustrated in The North China Star, Tientsin, one of the two American newspapers in China. In 1919 the paper had a circulation of 2,200 and was then a financial burden upon the Star publishing company. Today its circulation has increased only by a few hundred, but it has become a well paying concern. Despite its limited circulation, its advertising value is many-fold greater. The financial success of the Star is made the more surprising, because its price of of 1 cent (Mex.) a copy is only one-tenth of the price of most foreign newspapers in China. All this bears out the fact that newspapers in China are essentially commercial enterprises and not political organs like those in France, for instance. It is advertising that is paying the largest share of cost of the newspapers in China as it is here in America.

The second question regarding the writing of copy is probably much more important than the first question. At present advertising in newspapers in China is as crude as the newspapers themselves. All advertisements are necessarily of the pure-selling kind, but the copy is poorly written.

First in the foreign press, the advertisements are written by those who know little about the psychology of the Chinese people. They are based largely upon the market conditions in the Occident, and in many cases the advertisements are reproduced from mats sent over from America and prepared by Americans, who may have never seen China! Except possessing an appeal to the small number of foreigners in China, such advertisements are practically useless.

Second in the native press, the advertisements for American and other foreign firms are still worse, except in cases where they are prepared by the advertising departments of the newspapers. In most cases, the advertisements are direct translations from those used in America, and the translations are in some cases ridiculous and in others almost unintelligible or vulgar. It is indeed surprising to see that the firms, while willing to buy space in newspapers, are not willing to spend money to secure good copy. A large part of writing the copy is done by some young men who speak "pigeon" English and are half-baked in Chinese, and the copy each writes is intended to produce results!

The best course for American firms to take is to have copies prepared in America by some Chinese who understands the products or service to be advertised and also the psychology of their own people. In this wise, the home office of each firm will not only know what points of the products or service are emphasized but also how they are emphasized. The copies may be made into mats to be sent to China, or for fear of shrinkage the copies may be written as they are to appear in print and then sent across. In no case should an advertisement be written for the Chinese press by one who does not have a good command of the language. A poorly written copy is not only sure to be ridiculous but may even be offensive because out of good taste.

American firms which plan to advertise in newspapers in China should disown themselves of the idea that a space in the newspapers will bring the desired results. There should be something more than space. Indeed it is infinitely better to reduce the money for purchasing space in order to pay for better copy than to fill a whole page with nothing but worthless trash.

In this connection it may be of interest to mention that American products, such as toilet articles, etc., intended for Chinese consumption, had better be sold in wrappers prepared expressly for this purpose by some Chinese in this country. The reason is simple: American workmanship insures better appearance and attractiveness. A good wrapper in Chinese is an advertisement in itself. It is both economical and effective. It is at least worth trying.

To those who Sell in Cincinnati a those who Want to

IN 1922 THE TIMES-STAR carried the selling messages of local and national advertisers into eight out of every ten of the 141,000 homes in Greater Cincinnati. Twenty-eight per cent of these homes are owned by the families that live in them.

Cincinnati department and clothing stores alone used almost four million lines of display advertising in the Times-Star, and of the national advertisers who used it, one hundred and fifty used no other paper in this territory.

The total lineage of display advertising in the Times-Star last year, with only six issues per week, was one-fifth greater than the largest amount ever published in any year by any other paper in Cincinnati, including Sundays.

But this unrivaled supremacy of the leading newspaper in Cincinnati is not a matter of one year only. It has been maintained without interruption for fifteen consecutive years, increasing year by year. For a decade and a half the Times-Star has published an average of more than 27% of display advertising in excess of its nearest competitor. For the last ten years this excess has been more than 30%. Last year, with 10,459,407 lines of display advertising, the Times-Star led the second paper by 1,921,038 lines and distanced the third paper by 3,949,463 lines.

NO CONSPICUOUSLY SUCCESSFUL SELLING RECORD HAS BEEN MADE IN CINCINNATI IN THE LAST FIFTEEN YEARS WITHOUT THE ASSISTANCE OF THE TIMES-STAR. NO CONSPICUOUS AND CONSISTENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN IN THE TIMES-STAR HAS FAILED TO MAKE A SUCCESSFUL SELLNG RECORD.

REFORM FOR OMAHA SPEEDERS

World-Herald Artist Pointed to Jail, But Speedometer Man Knew Better

A novel advertising stunt has just been effected by the Stewart-Warner Company of Omaha. A few days ago, Judge Holmes of Omaha started to sentence speeders to from one to 90 days in jail at labor instead of fining them. Then a cartoon by Spencer appeared in the World-Herald.

The cartoon in itself was to show speeders the difference in miles per hour between a safe rate of speed and a speeder's rate. It showed a speedometer at 20 miles; then at 25, with the bars of a cell getting plainer; at thirty the cell appeared with the door closed; and at 35, the cell door was open, with a sign reading, "Reserved for you."

The cartoon quickly caught the eye of the local Stewart-Warner Speedometer manager, and now he is using it in a newspaper advertising campaign to equip cars that are not now using his instrument.

NEW WOODS TAX PLAN URGED BY BAKER

Plan Now Followed Causes Cutting of Timber Before It Is Ripe—Sees Ever-Present Menace of Canadian Embargo

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21.—The paper and pulp industry of the United States is facing lean years if a policy of reforestation which will permit the commercial growth of timber is not adopted. Hugh P. Baker, executive secretary of the American Paper & Pulp Association, recently told the Senate Committee on Reforestation now investigating the forest resources of the country.

"The timber has been cut away from the paper mills in the Eastern section of the United States," said Mr. Baker, "and we are paying a heavy penalty in freight and haulage, to bring paper from the West to the East and on Canadian wood. We are threatened with an embargo on wood from Canada, and we are turning to reforestation—to the practice of forestry to see if, in part, we cannot supply the paper industry with raw materials."

Although not more than 14 per cent of the wood or pulp made into paper by American mills comes from Canada at the present time, the shipments are not to be ignored, Mr. Baker explained. An embargo, he told the committee, was only a matter of time with propagandists broadcasting Canada with circulars and conducting a ceaseless campaign in behalf of prohibiting shipment of raw materials of the paper industry outside the Dominion.

"Here in the United States," said Mr. Baker, "is enough idle forest land, east of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio, if it were producing half a cord an acre per year, to make the country independent of importations. One-third of New England is not being farmed. In New York there are millions of idle acres. In Pennsylvania, out of 28,000,000 acres, we are farming only 10,000,000 acres. In Ohio there are 3,000,000 acres. In other words, we have plenty of forest land on which to grow the forest to take care of our needs."

Experiments in forestry undertaken by the paper manufacturers, Mr. Baker explained, are being conducted in the Adirondacks, where spruce timber grows readily.

"The large paper companies are planting their own forests as fast as they can," continued Mr. Baker. "The period of depression stopped them for a time, but we are getting back to activity now, and we are looking forward to the time when, with the assistance of the Government and the States, private owners will become interested and make it possible for us to maintain our paper industry. But the paper industry is facing a period of lean years between this time and the time when the planted forests begin to give us a return."

If reforestation is to be successful in the United States, Mr. Baker asserted, the tax laws must be changed. In Sweden and other countries where a satisfactory system of reforestation is carried out, timber is grown virtually tax-free and a severance tax is levied when the timber is cut. This tax in Sweden, in many instances, is as high as 45 per cent of the value of the cut timber, but during the growth of the timber the owner pays no more than a nominal land tax. The American system of taxing standing timber at its value as such virtually excludes private enterprise from raising timber or forces the owners to remove their stands with no thought of developing forests.

"The difficulty with us," he told the Senate investigators, "is we tax upon what we consider the value of the standing timber each year. So the lumberman will say, I have to cut that timber if I get out on it at all, and he cuts it before it is ready, sometimes. I am not sure that a change in our tax laws in the timber-yielding States is not more vital than fire protection."

N. Y. FOREST BILL DISAPPROVED

Paper Makers Demand State Survey Before Legislation Is Passed

A definite forestry policy for the State of New York was advocated in resolutions adopted March 20 by the executive committee of the American Paper and Pulp Association. The resolutions oppose legislation now pending in Albany, which would specify cutting regulations not in accord with unanimous recommendations of the association of technical foresters of the State.

The resolution said that passage of such legislation before the State has defined a practical forest policy would so confuse forest officials and forest owners that no reasonable forestry progress would be made, and urged that any further legislation be delayed until the State had conducted an effective, economic survey and worked out a reasonable forest policy applicable to both State-owned and privately owned lands.

The association, which is co-operating with the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and other similar organizations in the effort to get Federal legislation fixing a national forestry policy, decided to make forestry a chief subject of discussion at the convention in the week of April 9, in New York.

WATER LACK STOPS PAPERS

Newfoundland Lakes Frozen, St. Johns Press Can't Get Power

Daily newspapers in St. Johns, N. F., announced a temporary suspension of publication March 19, owing to lack of power to operate the presses. The company, which supplies the electric power shut down because of shortage of water in the interior lakes. Operation of street cars was abandoned last week. The city lighting system also will have to shut down, it is feared, unless a thaw relieves the situation soon.

PAPERS WILL CUT SIZE HOPWOOD THINKS

They'll Have to Some Day, Says Cleveland Editor, to Meet Scarcity of Print Paper

Erie C. Hopwood, editor-in-chief of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, predicts that metropolitan newspapers will be forced to cut their size. Faced with the shrinkage of forest tracts and the steady diminution of the white paper supply, newspapers of the United States, he thinks, "must make a complete readjustment of their methods."

Mr. Hopwood made this statement of the Cleveland Advertising Club in a talk before the members at Hotel Statler, March 16. He predicted that future daily newspapers will tell "news in fewer words," and said that "advertising space will be rationed among advertisers."

"I do not mean that there is any immediate prospect of this readjustment," Mr. Hopwood said, "but there is already a tendency in that direction."

Discussing the effect of particular types of news on circulation, he said that a world's series of baseball games or a Presidential election increased sales of the Plain Dealer about 10 per cent, "but ordinary stories have very little effect."

"Circulation," he said, "receives no continuing advantage from such news as originates with local news sensations of a criminal type. There is an initial advantage, but in the long run you as much as you gain, because pe sicken of the constant competition o The job of any newspaper is to su leadership in its own community, bu doesn't do anybody any good if you so far in the lead of the parade that are clear out of sight around the cor If the newspaper is to lead, it must main close to its readers by supply the news and entertainment desired."

PROVIDENCE, March 22.—The Providence County grand jury has reported no indictments in the cases of John A. It was on the lat-three cases that the grand jury re-ted.

ccording to the articles published in News, Lagace, known as a Demo-, and unsuccessful candidate, was roached by Reuter, manager of the ckman campaign, and a meeting was anged at the Providence-Biltmore tel in a bedroom of the Beeckman e, where three $500 bills were paid Lagace. Following the Providence News' exposure Mr. Beeckman was beaten for the United States Senate by 15,000 votes majority given to Senator Gerry, and the Democrats elected nearly all their state ticket, including the governor.

Before the change of administration in Rhode Island last year an indictment was returned against the Hope Publishing Company, the corporation publishing the Providence News, alleging criminal libel. This has not been disposed of but Vice-President James E. Garrison assures EDITOR & PUBLISHER that the company would welcome an early trial of this case with the opportunity to show the newspaper's complete justification of what it published.

Also, there is pending a suit at Newport by Private Secretary Reuter claiming $250,000 damages because he was called the tool of Beeckman. The Providence News publishers say they are quite ready to go to the bat on this issue, which involves the same facts upon which the Grand Jury failed to indict, but they do not expect Beeckman's secretary to meet them in court.

COUNTRY PRESS NEEDS EDITORS

Freedom from Print Shop Cares Is Necessary to Success

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March 20.—The time has come when the most successful country editor is the one who can divorce himself from the printing plant and devote his energies to the front office, the business and editorial end of the paper, Lee W. McHenry, editor of the Oneida (N. Y.) Democratic Union, made this statement to students in the department of journalism at Syracuse University in an address recently.

Mr. McHenry, a college man who started out to be a lawyer, followed in the footsteps of his father, who was editor of the Democratic Union for 35 years. After ten years as a country editor Mr. McHenry says he has nothing to regret and he forsees a great future for the country press "if college trained men and women go out from our schools of journalism and infuse young blood and enthusiasm into the papers."

"The day when the country editor had to be a printer, is past," said Mr. McHenry. The editor is worth more in the front office, outside the office and attending to the editorial end of his publication. The printing end of the business can be handled by a good printer, who may be a part of the firm.

"It is also true that there are too many country papers. It is a good thing some of them are dying out. The ones that survive will become better and make a more prosperous country press with larger circulations. But don't forget that the newspaper is the greatest medium to promote good will, successful advertising and a big job printing business."

Mr. McHenry spoke on the subject, "Publishing a Weekly in a Small City." He said that advertising ought to cost 40 cent an inch in a paper of about 1,500 circulation and that the sooner the country press learned to charge enough for its product the sooner it would be returning dividends on a par with other business enterprises.

H. E. KREHBIEL, CRITIC OF MUSIC, DEAD

With New York Tribune 43 Years—Known Nationally as Authority and the Author of Many Books

Henry E. Krehbiel, for 43 years musical editor of the New York Tribune, known the country over as an authority on composition and performance, died suddenly March 20 in New York after an illness of a few days. He was born March 10, 1854, at Ann Arbor, Mich., of the sturdy German stock that settled in the Middle West in the last century. In his boyhood his parents moved to Ohio and he was educated in the public schools of that state. Natural love of and aptitude for music led him to study that art privately, with the purpose of being not only a performer, but still more, an authoritative critic. At the age of 20, in 1874, he became the musical editor and critic of the Cincinnati Gazette, among the foremost newspapers in the West for literary, artistic and critical culture.

It was as a member of the staff of the Gazette that Whitelaw Reid first attained eminence as a journalist, and from it that he came to the Tribune, and though he had left that paper several years before Mr. Krehbiel became connected with it, his interest in it had by no means waned. When, therefore, in 1879, the Tribune's musical critic, John R. G. Hassard, failed in health and was compelled to relinquish most of his work, Mr. Reid summoned the young man whose work in Cincinnati was attracting favorable attention among musicians and journalists.

For a few months he assisted Mr. Hassard and did other work as a reporter. Then at the beginning of the musical season in the fall of 1880, he was installed as musical critic of the Tribune, replacing Mr. Hassard, who devoted his time to travel and literary criticism. Thereafter, for more than 40 years, Mr. Krehbiel was a power in the musical life of America. Down to within ten days of his death he was still conducting his department in the Tribune. A fitting tribute was paid to him less than a year ago when, on the evening of May 6, 1922, a testimonal dinner was given at the Harvard Club in New York in honor of his 50th anniversary of newspaper work. More than 100 friends were present, including many of the most prominent members of the journalistic, musical and dramatic professions, while appreciative messages came from Marcella Sembrich, Ignace Jan Paderewski and others. In addition to his work for the Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel taught music to private pupils for some years and was a lecturer on musical appreciation at the Institute of Musical Art, ever since its foundation in 1904.

His published books comprise more than 25 volumes on musical subjects. He served on the music section of the International Jury at the Paris Exposition in 1900, and was a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Yale University gave him an M. A. degree in 1909. Mr. Krehbiel's researches into American folk song, both Indian and negro, as well as compositions of other origin, are considered the most intelligent and authoritative that have ever been made.

Mr. Krehbiel was twice married—first in 1887 to Miss Helen Virginia Osborne, of Birmingham, Conn., who died some years later, leaving him a daughter, Helen, who now lives in Waterbury, Conn. He was married the second time, in 1896, to Miss Marie Van, an accomplished singer, of Brooklyn, who survives him.

Royal Cortissoz, art critic of the Tribune, when he heard of the death of Mr. Krehbiel, paid him the following tribute:

"My heart is heavy at saying good-bye to so staunch and lovable a comrade. He was a good friend and I am sorry for our profession. Krehbiel was a great type of critical journalist, like George W. Smalley and William Winter. He told the truth about things of the moment, recognizing the value of news as news. And he stated it with unfailing reverence to enduring standards of knowledge and good taste. He lived to furnish right thinking about music."

Deems Taylor of the World voiced his appreciation of the Tribune's critic in part as follows:

"There may be some debate as to what man in the world has known the most about music as an art and a science, but no one, I believe, not even Philip Hale, had Krehbiel's stock of first hand and documentary information about musical happenings. This reviewer once wrote that all a music critic needed today was Grove's Dictionary, Who's Who in Music, and Henry Krehbiel's telephone number. And on second thought, granted the third, I think one could dispense with the first item. For he was a walking encyclopedia.

"Did you want the date of the first American performance of Siegfried? Pop Krehbiel knew it—offhand, probably, for he had been there. Or was it the name of Rossini's cook you needed? He would get it for you or could tell you that the cook had no name. No need to ransack libraries for data concerning some resusticated concerto grosso of Bach and Haendel. The lazy critic had but to ask Krehbiel. And we all did, time and again. And he never failed us.

"I think the best clue to the man as a whole lies in the fact that he was so cordially detested by so many musicians who had never seen him, and that most of the people who knew him loved him, and called him 'Pop.'"

Mr. Krehbiel is the fourth renowned New York critic who has passed on during the last few months, the others being James G. Huneker and Henry Tyrrell of the New York Morning World, and Sylvester Rawlings of the New York Evening World.

GEORGE U. PIPER DEAD AT 57

Former Owner Seattle Post-Intelligencer and Press-Union

George U. Piper, at one time publisher of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and brother of Edgar B. Piper, editor of the Portland Oregonian, died on March 10 in Portland. He was collector of customs for Oregon.

Mr. Piper's life was closely allied with the newspaper industry in the Pacific Northwest. He was born in Warsaw, Ind., May 2, 1866, and the family came to the Pacific Coast when he was a boy. As a young man he was a reporter on the Post-Intelligencer under his brother, Edgar B. Piper, then city editor. In 1891 the two Pipers bought the Seattle Press-Times, but sold it a year later and both went to work within a short time for the Oregonian.

George Piper bought the Seattle Post-Intelligencer in 1897, the day that the steamer Portland arrived in Seattle with the first news of the Klondike gold discovery. He retained the property five years, and Edgar B. Piper was editor. During the later years of his life he was prominent in politics, first in Washington and later in Oregon. His death came after a brief illness. He was unmarried.

Now on All-Slug Basis

THIS great daily is one more that has now changed from the sorts caster system for display to the Ludlow System. Two Ludlow Typographs are being used to handle, on slugs, work for which sorts casters and foundry types were formerly used. Now the compositors do the whole job, no other experts being required.

Greater Expansion Now Possible

Mr. A. D. Marks, the manager, decided upon the all-slug system in November, and the Ludlow installation was completed in time to be of service for the holiday rush.

This installation included four series of Caslon, seven of Cheltenham, one of Century Bold and three of Gothic. The outfit of auxiliary characters for advertising effects was particularly complete, and included superior figures, fractions, percent marks, leaders, braces, brackets, fists, etc.

Mr. Marks was highly pleased with the excellent results obtained during the Christmas rush. It was one of the heaviest they have ever experienced. Distribution of used forms has been eliminated.

For big special editions or other rush periods, advertisements can be set far in advance and held without embarrassing the cases. The floor space required is greatly reduced. The quantity of composition in any one font is practically unlimited. Make-up is rapid with the all-slug system and work-ups and pull-outs are things of the past.

ANN ARBOR STUDYING GOOD MUSIC

Newspaper of University Town Stages First "Music Memory" Contest, With Free Concerts and $1,600 in Prizes

Ann Arbor's first "music memory" contest closed March 17, the date of the final concert. Commencing January 29 the contest, sponsored by the Ann Arbor Times-News, has created enthusiasm for good music in homes where before only apathy existed.

Thirty compositions were selected and from day to day a short history of the composition, together with a condensed history of the composer, was carried by the paper. In order to become a prize winner it was necessary for every contestant to familiarize himself with the composition so that he could recognize it upon hearing it played. He had also to know the name of the composer, the date of his birth and death, and his nationality. At the final concert examination papers will be given out and upon these the contestants will write their answers. The compositions will be played without any information concerning their identity being given out.

Through the contest editor, free concerts have been given in every school in the city. New news sources have been cultivated and influential friends gained.

More than 1,300 contestants have entered. On an average 2,000 have attended the weekly concerts, without taking into account visited private recitals and radio broadcasting. The Times-News installed a broadcasting station (WJAQ) for the duration of the contest.

Prizes offered amount to more than $1,600. In less than three weeks devoted to formation of the prize list, over 40 merchants donated prizes. The music dealers being the most interested, subscribed, with the exception of the paper itself, the most. There are five music dealers in the city; three of these contributed $200, one $125 and the remaining one $100. The prizes ranged between $200 and $1.50 and represented every type of merchant. One $150 phonograph, one ton of coke, a spring hat, book of music, theater tickets, wearing apparel and records were included.

Concerts were given in churches, theaters, halls, schools, before the Rotary, Kiwanis and Exchange clubs; the American Legion, a farmers' gathering and a funeral directors' convention was also entertained. Visitors made their appearance at the office of the paper daily and even on Sundays to have the records played over to them. The rural schools, in spite of snow drifts, icy roads and grippe epidemics, all had concerts. Box socials were suggested in the rural schools as a means of raising enough funds to purchase a phonograph.

The committee in charge was drawn from every organization in the city. Primarily a contest promoted to popularize good music and to gain good will for the paper, it has succeeded beyond the hopes of even the most optimistic. It is estimated that it will cost the paper less than $500.

Children in the schools have been enthusiastic and have interested their parents. The information which alone could win a prize was given solely in the Times-News and possibly two inside columns daily were devoted entirely to details. No extra help was engaged.

The music memory contest will become an annual event.

THREE MISSOURI NEWSPAPER EDITORS RUN STATE UNIVERSITY

P. E. Burton of Joplin, E. Lansing Ray of St. Louis and H. J. Blanton of Paris Comprise Entire Executive Committee—Only One a College Graduate

By MABEL CLARKE SIMMONS

IN Missouri, newspaper men aren't satisfied with merely running their papers and their communities. They also run such things as the state university.

E. Lansing Ray

The executive board of three members, which directly controls the University of Missouri, is comprised of newspaper men. They are elected by the nine members of the board of curators from that body, which is appointed by the governor.

These three men represent distinct types of journalism. P. E. Burton, chairman of the board, has very recently sold his small western city daily. He still has newspaper interests. E. Lansing Ray, when he isn't managing one of the state's largest schools, is managing one of the state's largest metropolitan dailies. H. J. Blanton, third member of the board, owns and edits a county weekly.

When Simeon E. Ray, father of E. Lansing Ray, died he was secretary of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Although the son was only six years old at that time, he declared that some day he wanted to fill his father's position. As a boy, he frequented the offices of the Globe-Democrat. He knew practically all of the workers on the staff and acquainted himself with all of the phases of the paper's activities. Before he was twenty, he was on the Globe-Democrat staff.

E. Lansing Ray is a graduate of Smith Academy at St. Louis. His mother wanted him to go to Princeton, but, despite the fact that he wanted a college education, he was more anxious to get started in newspaper work. Beginning in 1903, he served as advertising manager, secretary, director and vice-president of the Globe - Democrat and in 1918 he was elected president, editor and general manager, which position he now holds.

H. J. Blanton

H. J. Blanton is known throughout his native state as the "Horse Editor" because of a column of wit and philosophy called "Hints from the Horse Editor," which he runs in his weekly paper, the Monroe County Appeal, published at Paris, Mo. This column has given his paper one of the widest circulations of any weekly paper in the state. The "Horse Editor" comes from a family of journalists. His father, with whom he was associated for many years on the Monroe County Appeal, is one of the pioneer newspaper men of the state. Although his father has retired, the paper is still edited by father and son. Edgar P. Blanton, son of H. J. Blanton, is associated with his father on the paper. Mr. Blanton has a brother who edits another Missouri paper. He has been active in newspaper association activities for many years, serving as president of the Missouri Press Association and also as president of the Democratic Press Association of Missouri. Mr. Blanton was at one time a member of the state board of pardons.

Mr. Blanton is active in educational work in his county and each year brings high school students to the state university's Journalism Week exercises, and to the Farmers' Week program, given by the College of Agriculture, which is a part of the university. In 1918 Mr. Blanton's paper was awarded the cup offered by the School of Journalism to the Missouri newspapers whose files for the preceding year gave evidence of the "most constructive work in journalism on behalf of good citizenship."

P. E. Burton

Though these three men control a[t] versity, P. E. Burton is the only [m]ber of the board who is a college [g]uate. He received his degree fro[m] College of Emporia (Kansas), in [1]. His first position on a newspaper [was] on the Emporia Gazette, William [Allen] White's paper. Later he was on [the] staff of the St. Louis Globe-Dem[ocrat] and was political reporter on the St. Louis Republic.

It has been said that every city [ed]paperman has the dream that he [will] some day own a paper of his own. [Mr.] Burton is one who made the dream [come] true. In 1905 he bought the [Joplin] News-Herald, which he edited until [a] very short time ago. Mr. Burton [has] served longer than his associates on [the] board of curators. THE BIG SCHEME OF SIMPLE OPERATION

THE LINOTYPE ESCAPEMENT MECHANISM

It Insures Clean Proofs

IT would have been easy to devise a comparatively crude mechanism which would have served after a fashion to transmit the motion of the key to the magazine and release the matrix. But while a simple escapement would have been cheaper to build, its parts would soon become worn and it would be inaccurate. An inaccurate escapement means dirty proofs. This is another place where simple construction leads to difficult operation.

In the Linotype Escapement the motion is transferred to six moving parts so that the pawls (A-A) will move parallel to each other, and the load will all come on the supporting shoulders (C-C).

That is why a Linotype even many years old in service runs as fast, operates as accurately, and sets as clean proofs as a new one.

.NK PRESIDENT WITH ADVERTISING PUNCH

n Poole, Head of the Federal-Ameri- n National, Washington, D. C., roves that Advertising Pays and Offers Suggestions to Others

By Everett C. Watkins

his is a story of an advertising sales- who dropped in on John Poole, presi- of the Federal-American National c of Washington, D. C., to sell his s, only to find that the bank presi- is no mean salesman and advertising himself.

he advertising salesman had some- to sell the banker, but instead of g he became a buyer. Mr. Poole is thing more than a bank president— s a combination banker-advertising and salesman.

he salesman called to sell Poole ad- sing "copy"—ready prepared bank for insertion in the advertising col- of the local newspapers.

t Mr. Poole was already "sold" on rtising. He long ago found it good ess for a bank to advertise its serv- the newspapers. He didn't need to an advertising service, for he had writing "pulling" copy for his bank. nty-three ads written by Mr. Poole un in local newspapers had attracted attention among Washington news- readers. He showed the advertis- nan copies of the ads of his own rship.

e advertising salesman was immedi- "sold" on the Poole ads. Instead of ing a sale of his firm's advertising e, he negotiated with Poole for the ase of the twenty-three ads he had n. The result was that the sales- instead of selling the bank presi- dent, became purchaser and left Poole a check for $1,500 for the use, outside of the District of Columbia, of the Poole copyright ads. It was the first time the advertising service company ever bought "copy" prepared outside of its own office. "You'll be glad you saved," is an impressive line in each of the Poole ads.

While banking is Mr. Poole's business, he believes every business man should study advertising and learn of its power to promote and advance business. He reads everything he can find on the subject of advertising. He believes a knowledge of advertising is essential to a business man, and, of course, he recognizes that the newspaper is the strong medium with which to reach the public.

Mr. Poole first became interested in advertising through reading the ads in the newspapers. As a reader he thought some of the ads could be improved on. He read the advertisement of a nationally known candy company of New York. Reading it from the point of view of a prospective buyer, he thought there was something lacking in the "copy" to give it pulling power.

He dared to make changes in the ad and send his suggestion to the New York candy manufacturer. The candy manufacturer was impressed; he not only wrote the Washington banker "thanks for his interest," but incorporated the Poole ideas in the next batch of copy advertising the candy.

This encouraged Poole to try his hand again. He began writing the ads for his own bank, but he never dreamed that a representative of a bank advertising service would come along and write him a check for a goodly sum for the privilege of selling the "copy" to other banks of the country. Banker Poole is well known to the Rotarians of the country, by reason of having served as the international president of the Rotary Clubs' organization.

UNDS LONDON CALL IN WEST

n-Lawrenson Tells Chicago Men y England Wants A. A. C. W. Convention in 1924 and of Plans Now Under Way

Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

ICAGO, March 22.—F. W. Wilson- enson, chairman of the "On-to- n" committee of the Associated tising Clubs of the World, spoke Making More Profits By Reducing g Costs" today before the Adver- Council, Chicago Association of erce.

I was not on my own behalf, but in rsuance of my duty as chairman : 'On-to-London' committee that I ny recent visit to Great Britain," d in part. "At the Milwaukee con- n last year an invitation was pre- by Sir Charles Higham, who had over as a special envoy backed by Northcliffe, and by the Thirty Club ndon, to hold the advertising con- n of 1924 in London.

special committee was appointed stigate the matter and of this com- I was made chairman with instruc- to proceed to London, investigate port favorably or unfavorably to lantic City convention in June, 1923. just completed my official report ch I have strongly represented to low members of my committee that ommend the acceptance of this in- n and that a body of representative sing men, business men who are sers, publishers and so forth, at 000 strong, go to London in 1924, s friendly visit.

y things have moved to this nendation, but chief of all, I am the need, that I have been made of a wider, clearer, more sympa- nderstanding, by us of the British the British of ourselves, that is result from such a visit. We eard a good deal from friendly from England about the superi- f our American advertising and methods. I noted the difference od, but hardly the superiority.

"If England has something to learn from us in the way of expediting business and in advertising, we, on the other hand, may well take a lesson from her in stolid conservatism, in dealing with foreign markets and in the matter of adjusting credits to the needs and demands of our customers. If it is decided that we pay Great Britain such a visit in 1924, and I sincerely hope it will be so decided, it will not be anything like a condescension on our part. It will be a mutual help and mutual advantage.

"Great Britain is earnestly desirous of such a visit.

"Already in England committees have been formed, looking to our arrival. Lord Rothermere, of the Daily Mail, has voluntarily subscribed $25,000 towards the entertainment of the American visitors; Sir Edward Hulton, proprietor of the Daily Sketch, and other newspapers, has subscribed an additional $25,000, and the Newspaper Proprietors' Association of London has subscribed $10,000. All this before a penny has been asked for. There is no doubt but that if, or when the invitation is formally accepted, London will raise at least $250,000 for entertainment purposes in London.

"At the time it is proposed to hold the advertising convention in London, England will be holding the biggest exposition ever held in the world. It will be British Empire Exposition, at which will be displayed products and manufactures from every part of the Imperial domain.

"In June of this year a committee of 100 of England's leading business men, advertising men and publishers, is coming to the United States to repeat the invitations to London in 1924 and to tell in detail what London proposes to do. I have the highest hope that this invitation will be accepted in fine spirit in which it is tendered, and that this 'friendly visit' will result in a drawing together in closer bonds of business and brotherhood the two great nations in whose hands lie the destinies of civilization. I believe the World at large and especially every European country will be benefited by the world advertising convention in London in 1924, and I believe we Americans will learn a great deal from such a visit."

WHO SPENDS THE DAILY NEWSPAPER DOLLAR?

figures were drawn up by a successful business executive of a highly profitable property.

Available also are figures for two of the country's well-known metropolitan dailies, one on the Atlantic seaboard and one in the Middle West. Both operate on a budget system and both are profitable to their owners, how profitable they do not care to have stated in this comparison. The Eastern newspaper supplied the following data as to its expenditures, in percentages:

Editorial	26.0
Publication	8.0
Circulation	10.5
General	10.5
Mechanical	15.0
Paper and Ink	30.0
Total	100.00

Paper and Ink is, of course, the outstanding expense of any newspaper which prints daily and Sunday issues with paid circulations numbered well into six figures.

Editorial expense on this paper includes just about what it includes in the Inland budget, plus, of course, cables from its own correspondents in all parts of the world.

Publication expense is largely made up of the cost of securing and handling advertising, this item averaging about 6 per cent. The remaining 2 per cent covers office maintenance in the advertising, accounting and business office departments.

Circulation includes very much the same items as the Inland publishers note, and it is curious that the proportion is almost equal.

General expense covers approximately the items of the above small-city publications, with the additional information that salaries of administrative officers run about 2 per cent. Fields considered, the disparity in expense is not marked in the departments of advertising and circulation. Neither is there a wide gap between this Atlantic Coast paper and the small daily noted above in their editorial expenditures. Naturally, the overhead represented in administrative expense diminishes with increase in the size of the property, and, just as naturally, the amount spent for print paper increases, the greater the expansion of the property.

The Middle Western paper has a larger advertising patronage and considerably larger circulation than its Eastern contemporary, which will be found sharply reflected in its paper and ink percentage in the following table, the other items being reduced as this one grows:

Editorial	12.16
Advertising	5.49
Paper and Ink	43.38
Mechanical	10.09
Circulation	15.25

These percentages do not total 100, as they cover only operating costs and do not refer to administration. Passing the paper and ink item as not needing further explanation, the striking part of the above budget is its comparatively low editorial expense and its comparatively high circulation cost. Its editorial cost is one-eighth of its total expense, and is slightly more than half of that of the small-city paper called above the "Budgeted Daily." It is less than half of the Atlantic Coast paper's editorial expense. Analysis is difficult without the actual figures, which most publishers like to keep close to their vests.

Its circulation cost is between 40 and 50 per cent above that of the other papers we have examined. It is divided 8.1 per cent for promotion, 7.15 per cent for distribution. That might indicate plenty of healthy competition. The "Budgeted Daily" allotted 5.4 per cent of expense for promotion and an equal amount for maintenance and distribution.

Our "Budgeted Daily" and the Middle Western paper present some interesting comparisons in mechanical expense also:

	Middle Western	Budgeted Daily
Composition	5.90	14.0
Stereotype	1.39	1.1
Pressroom	2.80	2.8

That, again, is interesting, but hardly illuminative without the actual money figures.

Also of interest is a tabulation which came to hand this week of statistics of the Tokyo Hochi Shimbun, a daily of large circulation, but of small advertising lineage in comparison with the metropolitan papers noted above. The figures, forwarded by Commercial Attache J. F. Abbott, of the Department of Commerce, were presented by the Hochi Shimbun when it opened its new building a short time ago. They follow:

Editorial	8.72 per cent
Advertising	7.22
Circulation	14.98
Office	5.41
Composition and Pressroom	8.92
Paper	53.10
Miscellaneous	1.65
	100.00

Figures which the American publishers have not placed at the analyst's disposal were furnished by Mr. Abbott on division of expenditures, as follows:

Wages	65.6
Stereotyping	4.4
Casting	1.9
Zinc	4.2
Printing	3.9
Ink	17.5
Power	1.1
	100.00

The first table is entirely comprehensible, but the second evidently needs more explanation than is at hand in Mr. Abbott's report. "Stereotyping" can be translated as "steam-table operation"; "zinc" is evidently "stereotype metal," in which there is no zinc. Machine composition is not yet a major factor in Japan. "Printing" can probably be put into American as "press-work." The "ink" item is totally out of line with American budgets and is probably an error, as the second tabulation does not provide for newsprint, which is carried in the first at 53.10 per cent of the total operating expense.

But leaving the second table aside, note that this Japanese daily, one of the leaders in its country, spends six times as much for print paper as it does for the editorial matter with which to cover it. Editorial expenses of the Hochi Shimbun are about one-twelfth of its total cost of operation.

The Atlantic Coast paper spends one-quarter of its outgo on the editorial department; almost as much is put out by the "budgeted daily" referred to above. More than one-seventh of the Inland average budget goes into purely editorial department expense; one-eighth of the Middle Western paper's outgo is in editorial maintenance and production.

In advertising departmental expense, practically all of the systems compared are in agreement. The lowest is 5.49 per cent. The highest is the Japanese 7.22 per cent. It seems to be settled that advertising departments can be maintained efficiently on about one-sixteenth of the total budget.

Circulation departmental expense varies between 10 and 15 per cent roughly, depending upon character of territory and nature of competition.

Paper and Ink, usually paired, as has been shown, varies widely, according to the volume of advertising and the size of circulation. It is one-eighth of the Inland dailies' expense. It is more than half of that for the Japanese daily, which brings its raw materials from overseas at tremendous carrying charges. It is two-fifths and more of the Middle Western paper's outgo. It is three-tenths of the Atlantic Coast paper's budget. That is one budget item that cannot be held down, except slightly, by elimination of waste. The healthy newspaper, like the lusty schoolboy, must have a new suit every year to replace outgrown everyday garments.

But while an increasing newsprint budget is a sign of growth, or should be, that isn't true of administrative expenses. They should form a progressively smaller proportion of the total as the newspaper grows. A great newspaper puts its waxing force into the departments that will keep on growing, rewarding the executives whose direction has insured and will insure success, but not overloading its payroll with an "army of generals." Salaries to directing general, not departmental, executives, it was pointed out above, form only two per cent of the Atlantic Coast daily's budget. They will run considerably higher on publications of smaller dimensions, but will not increase proportionately as these dimensions are enlarged, but will rather decrease, granted that the compensation was equitable at the start.

All of this is vital. It is news for EDITOR & PUBLISHER readers. This comparison could not have been made ten years ago, probably not five years ago, but it will appear painfully inadequate ten years hence when the majority of publishers learn what has been accomplished by the progressive handful whose co-operation made it possible for EDITOR & PUBLISHER to present these data. Hard economic pressure is making publishers look on their newspapers as business enterprises and not as mechanical playthings that get themselves run somehow, with the help of Providence.

The day when a hatful of type and a mule-driven press enabled a man to call himself "Ye Editor" are gone forever. Gone are the days of the politician or pawnbroking banker as publisher. With the facts about his business before him, with standard cost-accounting methods established permitting comparison of results among publishers, the newspaper owner won't have to hock his property when he needs a few thousand dollars for improvements, he won't have to grovel before 100,000-line-contract advertisers, won't use his newspaper as a key to political offices, or secure political advertising, and he won't be afraid to share business facts with his neighbors in the town. He'll be able to face such changes in the business weather with disaster. He can put out a better newspaper than his city ever thought possible by hiring qualified editorial men and paying enough to hold them. And he can make money for himself, so that Europe, Florida, California, and South America will become more than names on the map for him and his family.

Or, he can go on as many of his friends are now going and watch his competitors knock him into a cocked hat before March 24, 1930.

Pennsylvania ranking 32d in area is second in population with 8,720,017 people.

Pennsylvania leads all states in mine[illegible]l and industrial production. Latest reports show anthracite coal output at 86,200,000 tons; bituminous output at 145,300,000 tons, worth together, about $900,000,000.

Pennsylvania has more than 20,000 industrial establishments, employing 1,523,000 workers, paying $1,864,000,000 in wages, $312,000,000 in salaries, using $5,075,000,000 of capital and producing over $8,500,000,000 of manufactured products.

Added to these enormous figures in Pennsylvania's wealth, is an investment of more than $2,250,000,000 represented in her farms, producing more than $500,000,000 in crops. All this may seem exaggerated, but nevertheless it is true.

Prosperity is permanently planted in Pennsylvania.

Consider this tremendous purchasing power. Pennsylvania is a profitable advertising center for National Advertisers.

Jane Hill Will Help You Get Corset Copy This Spring, Now

Fashion says "Corsets"—which means more corset advertising this spring.

To encourage correct corsetry is your part of the job—let the shops attend to selling their particular brands.

In this creational work Jane Hill's series of eight articles on correct corsetry will do their part. These articles mention no brand or kind of corset, but devote all their attention to helping women to a better knowledge of corsetry principles.

Jane Hill writes from her long experience in helping women dress more attractively. What she says will interest any woman who wants to look well.

The only drawback is that there is only one series of articles—so it is "first come, first served".

The articles will, of course, be sent on approval. The only cost is to agree to solicit your local corset shops energetically. That's fair enough, isn't it?

BRILLIANT DANCE GIVEN BY AD WOMEN

Affair at Pennsylvania Hotel Attended by 650 Guests—Two Orchestras Play—Many Souvenirs—Program Is Broadcasted

The New York League of Advertising Women added to its laurels again on March 20, when its eleventh annual ball, the most brilliant in its history, was given at the Pennsylvania Hotel. Termed as "The Awakening of Spring," the decorations carried out that idea with a profusion of spring flowers. An elaborate dinner was served and at each place was an exquisite booklet, containing a brief history of the League, and a roster of the members, also the program for the evening's entertainment. Each guest received a bag filled with souvenirs, including face powder, sachet, cigarettes and many other things, all gifts from national advertisers. In addition, a silver basket, a beaded bag, a ribbon corsage, a string of pearls, a gentleman's wallet, a sterling silver razor set and a tourist kit were given as prizes, and drawn for by the guests.

Following the dinner, a program was given, which was greatly enjoyed. Ruth Blackman Rodgers, well-known concert singer, gave a group of songs, followed by Eugenia Jones, "The California Nightingale," who whistled a number of selections. Kenneth Clark led the guests in community songs. At exactly midnight, Miss Adrienne Lachamp gave an exquisite dance, "The Spirit of Spring," which was most appropriate, as the first day of spring was being heralded in.

Two orchestras furnished music and dancing was enjoyed until two o'clock. Vincent Lopez, conductor of the Pennsylvania Hotel Orchestra, gave some special numbers which were broadcasted from WJZ station at Newark, N. J., with the statement that the orchestra was furnishing the music for the annual ball of the New York League of Advertising Women.

Six hundred and fifty guests were present, and the advertising and publishing profession were widely represented. Among those taking tables were B. T. Butterworth and Hugh O'Donnell, of the New York Times; William H. Rankin, W. L. Mullally, Charles Denhard, John B. Woodward, James Wright Brown, Powers Reproduction Corporation, Morse International Agency, Allied Newspapers, and the Sun-Herald Company.

PULP WOOD CONSUMPTION UP

Figures Indicate 1922 Increase Over 1921 Will Reach 17 Per Cent

The total quantity of wood pulp consumed by 172 mills in 1922 was 3,726,963 cords, as compared with 3,196,846 cords for the same mills in 1921, according to preliminary statistics compiled by the Census Bureau and the Department of Agriculture. The plants consumed nearly 70 per cent of the total of pulp used in 1921 and 72 per cent of the total used in 1922.

The mills, situated in 21 states, include two-thirds of the active mills in the country. The returns thus far compiled indicate that the total figures for 1922 consumption of pulp wood will exceed that of 1921 by 17 per cent, or a total consumption of approximately 5,300,000 cords.

PLAYING WITH RATES AGAIN

One Minnesota Legislator Would Quit Printing "Legals" in Newspapers

Some members of the Minnesota legislature seem bent upon putting newspapers out of business. One bill has been introduced cutting the present rate of legal notices from 90 cents for first and 45 cents for subsequent publications to 75 and 35 cents. Another bill fixes the rates at 50 and 25 cents. It is proposed also to reduce the number of insertions of financial statements from three to two and one bill goes so far as to authorize only one publication.

Finally, one statesman proposes that newspaper publication be dispensed with entirely and the statements published in pamphlet form. One of these bills would base compensation for legal publications entirely upon each 1,000 of circulation.

CIRCULATION DEMANDED

Montana Governor Vetoes Bill to Give Lowest Bidder State Copy

Asserting that circulation of a newspaper is the basis upon which the price of advertising is to be computed, Gov. Joseph M. Dixon, of Montana, has vetoed an act by the recent State Assembly, which provided that publication of the quarterly report of the State Treasurer should go to the newspaper making the lowest bid.

The governor expressed himself in favor of such a measure, providing circulation were considered. He pointed out, however, that the bill before him did not take circulation into consideration, and was contrary to good business and opposed to the public policy involved, that of giving the report the greatest possible publicity. Publication of the treasurer's report is required by the constitution.

Deluge in Mayfield

The office and composing room of the Mayfield (Ky.) Daily Messenger were flooded March 18 when a storm struck the entire county. About $250 damage was done to the machinery and many thousands of envelopes were drenched by the water.

IOWA

Area exceeds New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, New Hampshire, Delaware and Maryland combined.

Iowa has 219,439 farms, valued at over $8,000,000,000.

That is seven times the value of the farms in the six new England States, and twice the value of the famous orchards and farms of the three Pacific States.

The average value of lands and buildings exceeds $227 per acre.

Iowa has the largest ratio of automobiles per capita of all States, the farmer owned prevailing.

Iowa leads all States in literacy. Only 1.1 per cent are illiterate. The State has a large percentage of native-born whites —89.8.

A State offering such a great potential market should be the first choice of every National Advertiser.

KNOWLEDGE IS PROFIT

WHY should newspaper publishers and fair profits be such strangers to each other that the ordinary newspaper owner greets with a doubting smile a true story that one of his brethren in a large city had tripled the profits of his newspaper in one year without any abnormal increases in circulation or advertising revenue?

Why are newspapers the country over engaged in battles with department store advertisers whenever they decide that they must charge the advertiser more for the space that he uses daily?

Why do press agents who don't dare to approach magazines with their shoddy stuff consider the newspapers fair prey, even going so far as to offer as vendible features the same kind of copy that other publications accept only as advertising at regular rates?

The same answer goes for all three questions.

Newspaper publishers are only beginning to learn that they are conducting commercial enterprises, not subsidized charitable institutions, and that their profits should be regulated by their own efforts and abilities and not by the funds or favor of individuals or groups in their communities, or elsewhere.

Here and there throughout the United States newspaper publishers, who are business men as well, are looking past the old rules and actually learning how the money that their diligence and character brings to their enterprises is spent and how it may be spent more efficaciously. That they are finding it well worth while is indicated by the number of weak and mismanaged newspapers which have been eliminated since the United States went into the World War.

These newspapers were not serious competitors in most instances, but they made it impossible for a newspaper only little better managed than themselves to eke out more than a living. They kept the newspaper wage low.

They couldn't stand against another publisher who knew how much he was spending on his editorial staff, for wire service and for features, how much his advertising staff was drawing in salaries, commissions and office maintenance, whether it paid him better to add two pages to take care of a late advertisement, or to refuse the copy. This man knew how much it cost him to put a copy of his paper on the subscriber's doorstep, how much it cost to set a ten by two advertisement, and gradually he strengthened the weak places and eliminated the unnecessary expenses.

In a sentence, he had learned the things about his business that the merchant has long known who makes every square inch of its floor space pay a certain profit, or changes the goods or the manager who occupies the unprofitable inches.

That lesson has been driven home by hard pressure in the last five years, but it seems to be only half the real lesson. The benefits are individual. In these days of newspaper organization ideas of one soon become known to all, which is easy enough in departmental affairs, where the language spoken by executives is more or less common. In general management of newspapers, there is no common language, no definitions that apply to all branches of this publishers' problems, and the regional associations which have been working on it have made relatively little progress toward establishing these common cost definitions or simple standards of accounting.

It is important, because it is all-inclusive. Therefore, it is highly difficult of approach or solution. The ideas that a number of newspaper executives have evolved are set forth in this issue, but they are admittedly only a scratch on the surface of the bigger question of educating newspaper owners to the need of understanding their business and of placing it on a footing where it can turn a broad shoulder toward parasite press agents, rate-cutting agents, note-shaving bankers, and strong well-managed chain newspapers.

The newspaper business, thank Heaven, is still one of the most individualistic in the country, but it can act nevertheless co-operatively in many ways and in none of much greater importance than in inculcating throughout its ranks principles of good business management.

AN AMERICAN'S CREED

Compiled by Charles W. Miller,
Vicksburg (Miss.) Herald

BEHOLD, I am against the prophets, saith the Lord, that use their tongues, and say He saith. Behold, I am against them that phophesy false dreams, saith the Lord, and do tell them, and cause My people to err by their lies, and by their lightness; yet I sent them not, nor commanded them: therefore they shall not profit these people at all, saith the Lord.—(Jer. xxiii: 31, 32.) Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's. For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ. But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord. For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.—(II. Cor. 7, 14, 17, 18.)

A JOB FOR EDITORS

TO date the drive against the press agent has not made great progress in the daily newspaper, particularly because the men responsible for the editorial content have not taken any action in the matter.

Within the last few weeks the Inland Daily Press Association and the Georgia Press Association, among others, have followed the example of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in passing more stringent rules for curbing the evil. It is doubtful, however, if much good will come from their action. They are the business office men; the editorial people are the only ones who can control this growing problem.

Likewise, it is the editorial department that is suffering today because of a growth of this evil. The news bunk of the press agent has sapped the editorial department of American journalism as a whole of its initiative and has robbed it of its just compensation by giving the individual two masters—the newspapers, and the outside agencies they have chosen to serve in the field of publicity. There is no question that the press agent has seriously injured the business interest of the newspaper by getting for nothing the advertising that should have been paid for and decreased the revenue and newspaper's ability to pay for the thing that it needs.

Resolutions by business office organizations will unquestionably have a good effect, but they will be worthless unless they are followed by determined editorial action to kill the thing that is fast robbing journalism of every right it ever had to qualify for honors for militant public services.

It is true that until the present the editorial department has had no organization that could speak out boldly for it. That obstacle has been overcome within the last two years by the organization of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. The first big duty of that organization will be to clean the ranks of journalism, so far as it is in their power, of the parasites who hang on its outer edges and earn their livelihood by rendering publicity service to individuals and organizations whose motives are selfish and greedy. The press agent should have a place of first importance on the agenda of the first convention of this new society to be held in Washington in April.

The cure of the press agent evil is the first step towards cleansing newspaper columns of propaganda and is entirely in the hands of honest editorial men. Editor & Publisher expects the American Society of Newspaper Editors to assume leadership in bringing it about.

DOES RADIO BUILD GOODWILL?

THERE is probably no topic of wider inte newspaper men than radio, both from a point of good will as a business investme its commercial possibilities for news transm

This week at a radio conference held in W ton by Secretary Hoover, wave lengths were c to prevent confusion as a result of the nu broadcasting stations that have been esta within the last year principally by newspapers.

To some persons, probably old-fashioned look upon the newspaper as an agency for t semination of authentic information, it woul that in the present movement, journalism, inst fulfilling its true mission, is entering into the ment business on a gigantic scale.

It developed at the Washington conferen one newspaper is spending $85,000 annually o broadcasting. Another is giving a nightly sho includes everything known to modern vaudev

The fact that radio broadcasting has been largely an amusement enterprise is clearly in by the action of the American Society of Com and Authors in serving notice at Secretary H conference that it would put newspaper broad upon the same basis as motion picture theat others who used its copyrighted products. announced that $200 annually had been th decided upon for the use of these products t radio broadcasting stations, and $5,000 annu the larger.

Editor & Publisher believes that radio i to play an increasingly important part in the of the modern newspaper. Likewise, it believ will to be the greatest asset and the only tru of a newspaper's worth. Newspaper goo however, is not built on side-shows put f competition with legitimate amusements, but honestly and helpfulness in their own column

It is almost one year since Editor & Pu held an experimental demonstration for ne publishers at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. great deal of progress has been made since th radio has not built any tangible reader goo with one newspaper exception, it has bro adequate advertising revenue.

The radio mania has now reached the poin newspaper publishers should take stock and whether they want to embark in the amuseme ness on a scale never before attempted, or they wish to spend their money in putting i columns the kind of material that will creat interest and build good will.

NINTH IN INDUSTRIAL VALUES

must be considered an important factor in any advertising campaign, worthy of your attention and pretty certain to return results.

Still another reason Indiana is a state worth while for you to market your merchandise is that many natural resources, especially sands and clay, furnish bases of profitable industries for her people. Other natural resources such as timber, oil, gas and coal have greatly contributed to the buying power of the people of the state.

Advertisers owe it to themselves to carefully scan the Indiana field and its great possibilities. This field can be judiciously covered by use of Indiana newspapers.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

L. V. Ashbaugh

ST. PAUL, Minn.,
March 15, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: The more we study the character and business career of Mr. Ashbaugh, the more forcibly is driven home to us the simple, literal truth that Love is a far wiser and more powerful ruler than Fear. Not only did he generate in those in his pay the utmost zeal and loyalty, but he won the strong personal affection of every man of them. The new, delicious atmosphere thus brought about permanently captivated and inspired every grade of employee, from managing editor to galley boy.

Mr. Ashbaugh introduced paying innovations. For example, being the first to inaugurate daily editorial councils here, when editor or reporter advanced an idea worthy of the chief's adoption he was promptly paid for it in cash or its equivalent.

When Mr. Ashbaugh died, every eye in the Daily News office moistened if it did not overflow.

The late Torris Z. ("Tod") Cowles, afterward editor of the American Economist of New York, came here long ago from the Chicago Tribune to be managing editor of the paper of which I was night editor by title and assistant managing editor in fact. We were brothers from the start. By giving me a free hand on the editorial page as paragrapher and writer of signed jingles, Mr. Cowles provided the best chance I had ever had to prove capable of something better than drudgery.

I could have died for that man without a murmur and with a smile upon my lips.

JOHN TALMAN,
Newspaper Librarian, Minnesota Historical Society.

Well Done, Mr. Kline

HOMESTEAD, Pa.,
March 15, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I have before me "copy" from the Jason News Feature Service, 244 Madison avenue, New York. The "copy" is nothing more nor less than a half page free advertisement for Colgate & Co.

It begins to appear to me that only concerted action on the part of publishers is going to put an end to this pernicious habit of getting something for nothing under one guise or another.

Colgate & Co. are big enough to pay for advertising if they want it. They advertise very regularly in the magazines and we believe they pay when their bills are due. Why, in the name of fairness, should they hire an agent to try to filch from the newspapers what they pay for in the magazines?

The rank and file of newspaper men are slow in coming to the realization that, by accepting such stuff and nonsense as is being sent out "gratis" in the shape of half-page ads that don't bring in a cent they are doing their own profession the greatest harm they could possibly do.

Sincerely yours,
BERT F. KLINE,
Managing Editor, Daily Messenger, Homestead, Pa.

EDITORIAL NOTE—The "feature" offered to the Messenger by the Jason News Feature Service, as "exclusive in its territory," tells the story of the manufacture of perfumes and their fitness as Easter gifts. It is attractively put together, with the Colgate trade-mark "Florient" cunningly woven into the middle of the story, followed closely by an account of Colgate experiments to determine whether American women prefer domestic or imported perfumery, with the domestic brand getting the decision, of course. The illustration which consumes considerably more than half the space is a line-cut of a hoop-skirted belle of Dixie, emerging from the well known magnolias, the "reproduction by Courtesy of Colgate & Co." As one piece of copy in 10,000-line newspaper campaign in the dailies which the Jason Service thinks like to give their space away, it would probably sell all the perfumery that Colgate & Co. cared to put on the Eastern market. It would decorate the advertising columns of any newspaper, but it marks the editor who prints it as a feature as one who likes sucker bait.

A Space Saver

ONTARIO, Calif.,
March 14, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Sometime ago, in one of your editorials, it was stated in effect, that every time that a large newspaper used a superfluous line, a spruce tree was needlessly sacrificed.

For a number of years, the Daily Report has been practicing an economy, which I believe could be practiced by every newspaper without any cost whatever, but making a tremendous saving in, not only paper, but also time and labor.

The writer has long held that the publication of date lines preceding every telegraphic news dispatch is superfluous. That the reader of every afternoon paper takes it for granted that the dispatch date is of that date and every reader of a morning newspaper assumes that the dispatch date is of the day before. During the war as a matter of conservation the Daily Report eliminated date lines, and they have been eliminated ever since.

That my contention has been correct is evidenced by the fact that it has been put to the test a number of times before newspaper gatherings, classes in journalism, individual readers, and clubs of readers, and none of them has noticed the absence of the date line until the omission was called to their attention.

The elimination of date lines saves the time of the original writer, telegraph sender, telegraph reader, telegraph editor, linotype operator, proofreader, make-up, and most important of all the reader. There is an enormous saving all along the line, of labor, time, material and money.

This may seem a small matter, but in view of the fact, that it costs absolutely nothing to introduce it, and effects enormous economies, should certainly warrant consideration for the suggestion from all desirous of rendering enlightened public service. In the interest of the public as well as the craft, may I not ask you to bring this before the publishers of America through the EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

CROMBIE ALLEN,
President,
President, Southern California Associated Dailies.

Simmons Ad Office Stays in Chicago

CHICAGO, Ill.,
March 17, 1923.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Reports of the approaching transfer of the executive offices of the Simmons Company from Kenosha to New York have given rise to some misunderstanding as to the location of the company's advertising department. Permit me to state that, while the executive offices will be at 110 East 42d street, New York, the advertising organization of the company will continue, as in the past, in Chicago, at 1347 South Michigan avenue.

Very truly yours,
A. G. SIMMONS.

WANTS QUICK AMENDS FOR ERROR

Dallas Ad Secretary Says Business Would Improve by That Plan

"The character and stability of all kinds of business in Dallas would be enhanced through the employment of a system of advertising suggested to the Better Business Bureau in a meeting of the merchandising group," according to Hugo Swan, manager-counsel of the bureau. In substance the plan, as outlined by Mr. Swan, would require an advertiser who carries an incorrect or false statement in an advertisement in one of the Dallas daily newspapers, to make a statement in the same paper in which his advertising appeared explaining the error and offering to make up for any dissatisfaction occurring directly from the advertisement.

GATHERED AT RANDOM

A Word to the Youngsters

THERE is a sort of something like wisdom which comes to a fellow with his gray hairs.

You young chaps will experience it some day. It may be, let us hope, that you will be of the few who realize the dreams of their youth.

But you will probably find, as most of us have found, that youthful dreams, or many of them at least, are better unrealized.

The price of dreams realized is high and often bitter. But good, driving dreams—dreams which before they come to pass fade into other dreams of deeds yet to be done in days yet to come—are a blessed thing.

When the dreams no longer fade into other dreams—good night.

The veteran thinks back. This fact will indicate to you, perhaps, that he is down and out. Such is not necessarily the case. He may be down, if failure to acquire a fortune in money or a place in the journalistic sun may be termed down, but he is not out. It may be, indeed, that he is further from being out than when he pursued with two sturdy legs and an undentable belief in a large gilt destiny the elusive news story or imparted editorial pabulum to the largest circulation of hicks (he called 'em so in those days) in the county—sixteen hundred forty-one bona fide subscribers—count 'em—yes, sir!

He has come to know now that a majority of those hicks were his superiors, and that they endured him because of the goodness of their hearts. Solid folks they were, with solid families, who read the Bible and the New York Tribune and reasoned things out.

The veteran was not especially keen for the Bible. He had a feeling that to read it would cramp his style, and he felt perfectly well qualified to frame up his own heavy stuff without assistance from Solomon or David or Isaiah or any of the other stars of that publication.

A mistake that was a pretty serious one, for he wasted a lot of golden moments trying to do that which had already been done and was his to take. Of course, he made a fizzle of it. The fruit, ripe and ready for the picking, he passed by, growing his own little apples and marketing them green.

Every fizzle in the days of a man must be unfizzled if he is to be saved. Such is the law. And the unfizzling process is long and arduous, mighty near as long as the span of earthly life.

Give heed, young man, you with the newspaper motor in your bosom popping, to these words:

Sit at the feet of your paper's friends and supporters and listen to their talk, and of their talk make flavor for the writing you do for them.

Listen only to the counsel of men who have earned by proven sincerity the places they occupy, for the mouthings of false prophets are not sage but rue and consume much time and cause divers troubles, whereas the words of the truly knowing are few and precious and divert you not from the course of your own development.

Devote your time and strength to a live field. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and there is more weariness of the flesh in pursuit of emolument in places where it is not than in places where it is. Money is not an end, but an essential means to an end, not the flame of the lamp, but the oil in the bowl.

Be faithful to your own ideals and fear not.

Be simple in your writing and plain and straightforward, for your average reader is no lover of the ornate. Know that the greatest of beauty in diction is the honest word that carries its meaning direct to the reader's mind.

Beware of the gossip who gives out half truths, for the half truth is less respectable than the lie, being garbed in deceit.

A dealer in half truths once met a young writer of news and spake unto him saying that an announcement of the engagement of a prominent citizen and a certain woman had been announced at a social meeting. Wherefore, the young writer of news made copy therefrom—yea, much copy with screaming headlines—and the same went through. And the town was rocked to its foundations, for the citizen was high and of great wealth, while the certain woman was low and of tarnished repute. And it came about in the morning of the first day, which was the day the story was published, that hell was to pay, for much advertising space was involved, and the young writer of news sought his informant, who grinned, saying verily the announcement was made as he had said, but not by the certain woman nor by the prominent citizen nor by any who knew. So the young writer of news went in meekness to the boss and spake of a departure he contemplated making from out that locality.

And the boss was gruff, saying that he should make the departure exceedingly snappy, for murder was in his heart and the limit of his endurance was 3:40 P. M. And the young writer of news went forth on the 3:20 train.

Yea, it is a sad world, but from the sadness thereof springeth that which is called wisdom.—DAVID H. TALMADGE.

Militant Journalism

W. G. Naylor, who travels for the NEA Service, Inc., tells this one on Texas journalism:

"When I was in the San Benito Light office March 16, word came in of Mexican thieves coming across the Rio Grande, stealing harness from several farmers west of town and shooting a 14-year-old boy through the leg when he attempted to stop them. Paul Cottrell, city editor of the Light, immediately left his typewriter, threw three repeating rifles into his Ford, called in two others and hit the trail. In the gun fight that followed they captured one of the thieves and the harness, the others getting across the Rio Grande and away to their well-known roads.

"Then Cottrell returned to his desk (6 miles) and proceeded to write the story and get through the other copy. It was like covering a fire to these fellows."

Tactics

The war brought a number of military phrases into civilian usage, as everybody knows.

In a newspaper office recently the city editor looked wearily at the bright young reporter who had submitted a big bundle of copy in a description of some trivial incident.

"Deploy that!" he snapt.

"Deploy it?" repeated the new man. "I don't understand."

"Turn that column into a line."—Dry Goods Economist.

SALT LAKE CITY, March 18.—The Pembroke advertising bill, an extension of the Salt Lake City ordinance on the subject, has passed the State Legislature and received the Governor's approval. It was originally copied from the ordinance in force in Richmond, Va. An amendment, however, incorporated at the last moment, makes it unlawful to offer goods as all wool unless this is literally true.

DOLLAR PULLERS

Advertising and circulation managers are always on the lookout for new ideas that will increase advertising receipts and win new circulation. Your idea for increasing advertising or circulation may not appeal to your manager, but it may be just the thing that some other manager wants. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each idea printed under this head. The fact that the idea is now being used in your city does not bar it from the department. Address your communication to the DOLLAR PULLER EDITOR. When they appear clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable ideas will not be returned.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER receives a great many requests for the names and addresses of contributors to the Hunch and Dollar Puller departments from newspapers anxious to get in immediate touch with them. Under the system of using only initials of contributors it has in some cases taken us six weeks or more to connect the wires. For this reason better service will be rendered in the future if the following form is followed in the case of each contribution to the departments:—Name of contributor, name of newspaper, employer or home address, name of city, abbreviation of State name.

IN the spring the peoples' fancy lightly turns to thoughts of strawberries, garden truck and so on. Consequently it would be a good stunt for the newspaper in the Spring time to run a page of ads of folks handling Spring foods. An appropriate heading over such a page should make it easy to sell space on the page.—F. H. W.

Suggest to your leading dealers in wall paper the publication of an advertisement at the proper season on wall paper to be issued as a supplement. One or more of them will fall for it hard and pay the bill cheerfully. If the reading matter to fill out the sheet is of the clean-up, paper-up sort, so much the better and so much the easier.—D. H. T.

From March to mid-Summer is a comparatively short time, and it is none too early now to arrange for the advertiser of Summer commodities. The Buffalo News had five items one day last week under its clasifications Summer Homes.—R. E. Downer, Buffalo Express, Buffalo, N. Y.

Get behind some worthy charity or money raising proposition. Announce that every subscription brought in until a certain date will be credited to that cause. Give the cause a ratio of the money brought in.—S. M. R.

A Texas druggist recently had an advertisement of thermometers headed "Buy a Thermometer Now; They will be Higher Next Summer." This is a good suggestion that any advertisement salesman might use to advantage.—W. H. M.

An Austin, Tex., department store drew an unusually large crowd to its Monday sale of toilet articles by announcing that 1,000 bags of samples would be given away with each purchase amounting to one dollar. The samples had been furnished free to the store, of course, by the manufacturers. Cloth bags made of a cheap colored goods were used for the packages.—J. T.

The Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald, on January 21, came out with a five column, full page deep ad on advertising, using a part of the speech of D. Bradlee Rich, who addressed the Boston Advertising Club. The speech in part was reprinted from a recent issue of THE EDITOR & PUBLISHER.—A. R. D.

"One of the leading florists of Topeka, Kan., boosted the sale of cut flowers by adding a little line to the famous nation-wide slogan of florists. He advertised. 'If you say it with flowers, say it with ours.' This, together with his signature cut was all the ad contained. It was snappy and attractive and got results. This could be used by any florist in any town."—J. W. H.

Spring time is tonic time, so when spring is just around the corner, it would be good business for the paper to get up a page of ads of drug stores handling various spring tonics in each of which ads the stores would tell about the tonics they were handling and would urge the folks to tone themselves up by taking the tonics. The heading over the page might be something like this: "These Tonics Will Banish Your Spring Fever."—F. H. W.

In each advertisement appearing on a double page in the Columbus (Ohio) Citizen, a familiar quotation was given incorrectly. To the persons sending in the most complete and correct set of the quotations, prizes aggregating $50 were awarded. The following week, the advertisements were repeated with the quotations given correctly.—B. A. T.

With every subscription brought into the office until a certain date, each new subscriber received a reduced rate ticket to some point of interest. Arrangements are made with an excusion boat line to honor these tickets, as full excursion rate fares. The cost to the periodical or newspaper is the added advertising to put the idea across. There is no comeback, as in most other circulation schemes, and all parties profit all around.—S. N. R.

A general advance in tire prices is being announced by some manufacturers. Encourage your local tire dealers to give the public a chance to lay in a supply of tires at the existing low prices by announcing the date the advanced prices will go into effect ten days or aweek previous to the day.—R. B. M.

One of Cleveland's largest department stores—the William Taylor Son & Co.—carries almost daily in its display newspaper advertising a column headed "Ann Sawyer Says." This column is one of the most widely read by women in Cleveland. It is more popular than any "colyum" conducted in the city's papers by professional jokesmiths or poet-humorists, because "Ann" always has something to tell women about what's what in fashion's circles and where they can find novelties in the Taylor store. Often "Ann" quotes poets, dramatists and refers to world events, if their application is proper. The "sayings" are crisp, well said and even interest men. The "Ann Sawyer" column is really contributed by the advertising and publicity department of the Taylor store, but the mythical personality of "Ann" appeals to readers, because she's chatty and gets close to people she wants to tell something in a confidential way. "I shop with you and for you" she reminds her readers. For instance, she starts off her "sayings" one day by saying, "I raved over a swagger young sweater on the fourth floor." Then she drops into a chatty line of conversation, telling all about the sweater, what it "looks well with" and its cost. This column feature is an outgrowth of the store personal service bureau.—J. H. WEBB, Cleveland Plain Dealer, Cleveland, Ohio.

POWER AND LIGHTS CAN'T GO DOWN IN MERIDIAN STAR PLANT

TO guard against shutdowns due to electric power failure, the Meridian (Miss.) Star has installed a 50-horse power automobile engine directly connected to a 30-horsepower alternating current generator, as illustrated above. The generator produces alternating current of three phase 220 volts 60 cycles for the linotypes, stereotype machinery, and 28-page combination Hoe-Scott press. For the lights there is an oil transformer which reduces the voltage from 220 to 110. The illustration shows an old Stoddard-Dayton four-cylinder automobile motor purchased from a concern that specializes in dismantling old automobiles.

The engine is mounted on four posts of 2½-inch iron pipe which are bolted to the concrete floor. The regular automobile clutch slides about one-fourth of an inch on the connecting sleeve which is attached to the generator. To save space, the direct current generator, which is used to excite the fields of the alternating generator, is on the platform above the alternating generator. All of the instruments are on the same platform.

Cooling is accomplished by pumping water through a large tank, like that on a kitchen range. A speedometer (not shown in the picture) indicates a speed of 18 miles an hour when the generator is turning 1,200 revolutions per minute. The governor, which was taken from a Fairbanks-Morse stationary engine, is attached to the throttle of a new style Stromberg carburetor so that the speed of the engine remains constant regardless of how much load there is on it. Whenever the emergency outfit is needed, a double throw switch is turned from the central power station wires over to contact with the emergency wires. This outfit was installed in the extreme rear of the first floor, which houses all the mechanical plant. It occupies a space of about six feet by ten. The total cost, including the rebuilt generator, was about $900.

'BACCY ADS NOT WHOLLY BANNED

Utah Permits Them in Press, But Not for Cigarettes—Latter May Be Sold

The new Utah tobacco law makes it unlawful to advertise tobacco in any form on billboards and in any other way, except in periodicals. The ban on cigarette advertising is as absolute as before; this form of tobacco must not even be displayed in store windows. Under the new law, however, cigarettes may be sold under a high license tax. The license is $100 in cities of the first class and $25 in communities ranking lower than third class. In addition a $500 bond must be procured and a stamp tax placed on the sale of cigarettes, to be collected at time of sale. This tax is as high as two mills on large cigarettes.

The new law is the result of a bitter fight for the repeal of the now famous Southwick law, which prohibited the sale and advertising of cigarettes and smoking in certain enclosed public places. The latter section of the law was also slightly changed. Friends of tobacco had a hard struggle to get an amendment permitting the advertising of tobacco other than cigarettes in newspapers. It was contended that without this privilege all the Utah tobacco manufacturing companies would go out of business. This law aroused more interest on the part of the public than all the rest of the legislation put together!

Change Made to Be Honest, Says Portland News

The Portland (Ore.) News a few weeks ago discarded the big headlines from all of its six daily editions except the last. The experiment seemed a somewhat hazardous one. The street boys howled—said they couldn't sell a first edition without a screaming headline. But gain instead of loss in circulation, both street and otherwise, have resulted. Editor Fred Boalt says: "We have put on an additional 1,500 since we made the change. Perhaps we would have made this growth, anyway; I don't know. We didn't make the change, primarily, to gain circulation. We made it to be honest in our measuring of news values—to work up to a real climax instead of down from a fake one."

HUNCHES

Managing editors and city editors are always on the lookout for news and feature ideas that can be used locally. Editor & Publisher will pay $1 for each hunch published under this head. The fact that the hunch is now being worked successfully in your city does not bar it from this department. Address your contributions to the Hunch Editor. When they appear, clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable hunches will not be returned.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER receives a great many requests for the names and addresses of contributors to the Hunch and Dollar Puller departments from newspapers anxious to get in immediate touch with them. Under the system of using only initials of contributors it has in some cases taken us six weeks or more to connect the wires. For this reason better service will be rendered in the future if the following form is followed in the case of each contribution to the departments:—Name of contributor, name of newspaper, employer or home address, name of city, abbreviation of State name.

HOW many people are there in your city of over 30 years of age who have never had anything done to their teeth in the way of repairs and whose teeth are perfectly good? There probably are very few such people and those folks who have such teeth are, unquestionably, mighty proud of them. So it would be a good stunt for you to offer a prize of a couple of tickets to some movie theater to every local person over 30 years who has perfect teeth and who is willing to prove the fact by having teeth examined by a dentist, who would volunteer his services for the examinations for the publicity he'd get out of the stunt. The movie theater would, of course, donate the tickets in view of the advertising it would get for its current play—a picture which might be designated as being full of meat and the kind the folks can sink their teeth into and know they've got a bite of something good. All the names of the winners should be published, of course. All this would be different and decidedly interesting and so would make a big hit with the paper's readers—F. H. W.

An interesting feature of a local newspaper is a column usually found on the second or third page, headed "The Reporter's Notebook." In this column we find short paragraphs commenting on unusual occurrences and surprising facts discovered within the past week. These articles deal wholly with local subjects and are always of interest to practically every public spirited citizen.—R. W. S.

Dorothy Deane, the Williamsport Sun's woman editor, has opened the columns of her page to youthful readers, children 6, 7, 8, up to 12 years of age, to tell what they want to be when they become men and women.—P. T. B.

Offer a small prize for the simplest and shortest poem containing all the letters in the alphabet. The experience obtained in writing such verses as these should be of benefit to school children in all grades.—B. F. C.

A bill has recently been introduced into the Ohio legislature requiring men to prove their ability to support a wife and family before they will be granted a license to marry. The author of the bill says, "Most unsuccessful marriages result from financial difficulties." Here's a good chance to get some interesting opinions from various people, particularly women, as to whether this man has the right idea. What constitutes "ability to support a wife and family" anyway? You will probably get just as many different opinions as the number of persons you interview. It might make an interesting feature to run some sort of contest, with small prizes for the most interesting letters submitted.—C. E. L.

Interview some of the more prominent business men in your city and find out what some of the big opportunities were which presented themselves but which this particular man failed to grasp. Get him to tell why he did not take it and what probably would have been the ultimate outcome had he taken hold of the opportunity. Perhaps someone has had the chance to buy stock at a small figure but was a little too hesitant and lost out altogether and today the stock is worth many times what it sold for. Many other similar instances will probably be found.—James W. Hesse, Topeka State Journal, Topeka, Kans.

An interesting feature can be secured by giving an assignment each week to the more advanced students of a local art school, to sketch some scene about town such as scene in library reading room, police court, theater lobby, depot, outdoor scenes, etc. Offer prizes of, say, 5, 10 and 15 dollars for three best pictures and a few at $1 each. This is good experience for the students and is often productive of good illustrations for feature articles.—T. R., Minneapolis, Minn.

The old ordinances of any city will furnish material for a good feature story. The San Antonio (Tex.) Light recently published such a story. If the city ordinances have not been recodified for some time, it is likely that the enforcement of many of those on the books would create considerable amusement as well as indignation. If the ordinances have been revised, then the old book of ordinances will furnish a wealth of historical data concerning the early-day life in the city. —J. T.

What is the present general physical condition of the young men of your community? Try getting a line on this from the army and navy recruiting stations in your district. We found that the navy rejections were mainly due to defective teeth and the army ruled them out because of underweight, mostly. Get figures on applications and rejections and work them up into a readable little story. If there's a marine corps recruiting station in your vicinity, don't neglect it.—W. A. M.

Is the drama coming to be used more and more in the churches of your locality? One of the Detroit churches has just announced the appointment of a paid dramatic director as a member of the regular staff of the church. We seem to be getting back to dramatizing the teachings of the church as was done in the early days of Christianity. A good story can be worked up here, bringing in the opinions of various ministers as to the wisdom or unwisdom of this tendency.—C. E. L.

Absorb to yourself a fair share of New England's orders by familiarizing its two million readers that buy daily newspapers with your name and your merits.

The New England market has a stupendous aggregate buying power. The families are spending millions of dollars today. They will spend millions more tomorrow.

Think of the power in the thought and repetition of thought of these two millions.

Think of the weight even a small percentage of their inquiries will have on the trade.

Concentrate your efforts in the most effective and yet economical way by advertising in this list of daily New England newspapers.

The result-getting power of these dailies has been proven time and time again. These papers are at your service, to assist you to open up the local market for your merchandise. Use the dailies intensively and you will get your goods called for by name all over New England.

Greater Service Is Demanded In Advertising To-Day

There was a time when an advertising agency did little more than prepare copy and select mediums on a quantity basis.

There are some agencies who do this to-day. But the real agencies that are building for the future have abandoned such careless methods.

Advertising is no longer merely a matter of cost per line per thousand. The vital consideration is "Will it sell the goods?" There was a time when the general mediums were preferred because of their ease of use and largest profits to the agencies. To-day these same buyers of space have been brought to realize that to hold customers they must produce results. They are therefore turning more and more to the daily newspapers.

There are still some who believe that a national campaign means throwing money blindly at the map through use of heavily duplicated magazine space.

There are still some who think that intelligent service to their clients means the purchase of space in the largest circulation medium in a territory.

But there is a growing number of those who painstakingly study the use of all mediums for the most advantageous appeal to people most likely to buy the goods advertised and, except in the case of cheaper goods, shun the gutter sheets consistently.

Effective space buying can often save the client much money that is ordinarily wasted by the careless dispenser of advertiser's dollars in mediums maintained on forced draught basis to pander to the unthinking.

ORRESPONDENTS BLUFF WAY BY FRONTIERS

American Used League of Nations Letterhead to Pass Guards of Three Nations; Story of the Man Who Overslept and Thereby Got a Big Scoop

By OTIS PEABODY SWIFT

EDITORIAL NOTE.—Even among newspaper men the way in which news is gathered for the cables is little understood. Mr. Swift has served as a member of the foreign staffs of the Chicago Tribune and the New York Tribune. In the last year crisis-chasing has carried him into twenty countries. This is the third of a series of articles on covering Europe, the next of which will appear in an early issue.

AMERICAN FOREIGN COR-ESPONDENT, looping the loop crisis to crisis across the map of , faces three problems.

Whenever he came to a er thereafter, he would present this y valueless piece of paper, and or- e officers to visa it. The remark- document carried the visaes of half Europe before his original pass- was finally found.
ut the time this story was going the rounds, one of the newspaper gang was held up at the Polish frontier. Officials claimed his visa was useless, and told him to go back to Berlin and get a new one. The reporter had no time to waste. He intended to get through.

Among his personal papers were two official looking documents. One was his birth certificate, signed by the City Clerk of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and carrying a huge red seal. The other was his high school sheepskin, also elaborately sealed.

He flourished these under the noses of the Polish guards.

"Visa or no visa, I defy you to halt me," he said in German. "Read these documents. They will prove that I am an important American diplomat, on a high mission to Warsaw. If you hold me up for two minutes more I shall have my friend Paderewski discharge you the moment I reach Warsaw."

The Poles, knowing no English, took the papers, studied them, upside down, looked at the seals, and then, all politeness, O. K.'ed his visa, begged his pardon, and told him to proceed.

Once the newspaperman has got there, there is more than one way of getting the news. A group of correspondents had hustled to a mid-Europe capital on some seething crisis. One night it was announced that the Premier would give important news in a speech the next morning at a town some 75 miles away. The only way to reach the accursed place was by a 4 a. m. combination train.

Some set their alarm clocks for three.

Some stayed up all night. Cold, hungry, and miserable they gathered in the train's smoking compartments as, at 4 a. m., they pulled out of the capital through driving rain.

All except one man.

He had been a failure on the job. He had consistently fallen down on every point of the story. He faced being fired. This morning he had completed his record of error by oversleeping, and missing the train.

It was not until 10 a. m. that he awoke. A vast cheering crowd was outside his hotel windows. The Premier, having changed his mind at the last moment, was making his speech in the main square of the capital. It was a sensational speech. It reeked of war and a shattered balance of power. It was Page One.

With every other correspondent kicking his heels in a deserted village 75 miles away, the blue envelope candidate scored a twelve hour beat that won him a bonus.

One European correspondent has his own little system for getting news. He maintains a secret service all his own, paid out of his own pocket. His "reporters" are civil servants in strategic government offices, clerks of big hotels, and government spies. This correspondent sits in his office and has his agents telephone in to him.

"This is No. 16," comes a voice, "I've just learned that—"

Another trick way of getting news developed when a stranger walked into a correspondent's hotel room in a Balkan capital.

"I have some very important news," he said, "I will sell it for seven American dollars."

"What is it?," asked the American.

"If I told you, it wouldn't be news," was the reasonable answer. "It is very important, as you can see by the price. I bought it for $4 from a telegraph operator who picked it off a government line. I'm only making $3 profit on it. If you don't want it, I'll sell it to your opposition."

Intrigued, the newspaperman paid over $7, and got the news, which concerned a mobilization order. While this system of selling news, unseen, is popular in Balkan newspaper circles, it was a new one on the Yankee.

The reporter has to watch his step, and his neck. When the black shirt Fascisti legions rose overnight in Italy and Mussolini delivered his ultimatum to the throne, one American correspondent filed heavily with uncomplimentary comment on the movement.

The moment the Fascisti triumphed, their representatives in the city where the correspondent was stationed announced their intention of forcibly treating the correspondent to a pint of castor oil. Friends of the journalist argued for hours with black shirts before convincing them that the projected cure might start trouble with the American government.

In Belfast, again, while riots were rife, a young American arrived from a London office to cover the excitement. Visiting the saloons where the civilian clad members of the Third Northern Division I. R. A. (the secret Republican army) hung out, he found himself forcibly evicted on sight. The rebels refused to listen to him: they just kicked him out. Returning to his hotel he chanced to look in a mirror. A short, bristly, close-cropped mustache, his particular pride, gave him the exact appearance of a young British army officer in "cits." The man was a true reporter. Ruthlessly he shaved off the mustache, returned to the saloons—and got his story.

And speaking of mistaken identity——

Charlie Chaplin came to London. London went wild. Waterloo station was jammed with 20,000 joymad people when he stepped from the boat train. Five thousand more waited at the Ritz.

Charlie had been in town two days when it was announced he would appear in person at the Beckett-Boy McCormack prize fight at Covent Garden.

One of the American correspondents covering the fight was a slim youngster about Chaplin's build. He sported a neat mustache. He wore a derby hat and a light grey overcoat. For two days the London papers had printed pictures of Charlie (mustacheless, of course), wearing a similar hat and overcoat.

The correspondent taxied to the fight. At Leicester Square he was stopped by the outskirts of a mob of 5,000 people, surrounding Covent Garden, hoping to glimpse the hero. With one shout they acclaimed the correspondent. "Here's

MEETING THE OTHER FELLOW

THAT is the most helpful thing about conventions. We get a chance to forget our own troubles and think about those of the other fellow's. Incidentally the contact helps us solve our own. When we stack our own up against those of the other fellows we find they don't amount to much anyway.

We are pretty certain to find the "other fellow" who labored over like problems and solved them, in any gathering where a few hundred men meet and casting aside reserve get down to brass-tacks. That is why conventions are valuable to the individual.

Newspaper men coming to New York for the annual meeting of the Associated Press and the American Newspaper Publishers Association or to Washington for the meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, during the week of April 22, are going to be pretty busy. That is the reason that we want to remind you that EDITOR & PUBLISHER will be at your service in both places. EDITOR & PUBLISHER offices at 1115 World Building is YOUR service station. Call upon it any time. For your convenience, headquarters will also be maintained during Convention Week, at Suite 116 Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

MRS. HARRISON REPLIES TO CHARGES OF MRS. STAN HARDING

American Newspaper Woman Makes First Detailed Statement on Her Relations with British Writer in Russia—Break Result of Imprisonment of Both by Soviet

Mrs. Marguerite E. Harrison, well known American newspaper woman who recently returned from the Far East and Russia, has prepared a detailed statement that follows of her activities in Germany and Russia in 1919-20 as a newspaper reporter and observer for the United States Government for EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Mrs. Stan Harding, backed by the National Union of Journalists, Great Britain, is now attempting to collect damages from the United States Government because of her imprisonment in Russia.

It will be noted that Mrs. Harrison refutes all the charges that Mrs. Harding has set up as a basis for her claims for damage, and which have been reported in detail in EDITOR & PUBLISHER from time to time during the last six months.

Mrs. Harrison's statement follows:

"Since my return to New York I have learned in detail of the charges made against me by Mrs. Stan Harding, in which she accuses me of being the cause of her arrest and imprisonment by the Soviet Government in Moscow in June, 1920, although I was informed of their general nature from articles appearing in the Chinese and Japanese press during my stay in the Far East last summer. At that time there were reasons why I felt that I could do nothing but make a categorical denial which would not have helped to clear the matter in the least, and I preferred to remain silent on the subject. Since the statement to Mrs. Harding a few weeks ago in London by Major O. N. Solbert, Military attache of the American Embassy, to whom she was referred by the American Ambassador, in which he was quoted as saying that Mrs. Harrison had rendered valuable services to the American Government, I feel that I am at liberty to explain the circumstances leading both to my arrest and to that of Mrs. Harding in Russia.

"I first met Mrs. Harding in Berlin in January, 1919 where I was collecting material for a series of articles later published in the Baltimore Sun, on post-war conditions in Germany, and sending reports on social, political and economic conditions through the Military Intelligence Division of the A. E. F. to Paris, for the use of the American experts who collected data for President Wilson during the Versailles Conference.

"Mrs. Harding had been in Germany since the summer of 1918. Although by birth an Englishwoman, she was a German subject, having been married to a German, and owing to this fact she was asked by the British Intelligence to go to Germany and report on the imminent breakdown in that country. She sent reports to her government until the Armistice, when the necessity for such work having ceased, her services were discontinued, and she acted for a time as correspondent of the London Daily News, meanwhile giving voluntary information intermittently to the British Military Mission in Berlin, of which General Ewart was the head. I learned the facts above stated from Mrs. Harding after we had known each other for a few weeks.

"When her work with the Daily News came to an end, and she was temporarily out of employment, I invited her to share my room with me at the Hotel Adlon, and we lived together for several months, until my departure from Germany after the signing of the Versailles Treaty. During this period Mrs. Harding from time to time supplied me with valuable information regarding parties and movements in Germany for which I paid her according to mutual agreement, and she was the means of securing many introductions for me to important persons, as well as the entree to meetings of various party organizations. This fact had an important bearing on what happened later in Russia. When I left Germany at the end of June, 1919 Mrs. Harding told me that she intended to remain until she had secured her divorce, then claim British citizenship, return to London and enter the interior decorating business.

"I heard no more of her until June, 1920, when I learned through the Moscow Foreign Office that she had applied for permission to enter Soviet Russia as the correspondent of the New York World. I had, during the interval returned to the United States in September, 1919, leaving again at the end of October for Poland as special correspondent of the Baltimore Sun and occasional travelling correspondent of the New York Evening Post, with Russia as my objective. While in London en route for Poland I made a tentative arangement with Mr. Collins, European Manager of Associated Press, whereby he consented to accept me as Moscow correspondent provided I succeeded in entering Russia. I had also agreed to observe conditions and furnish confidential reports on Russia for the information of the American Military Intelligence.

"I entered Russia through the Polish Front, without documents or papers on February 8, 1920, and was arrested in Moscow six weeks later. The evidence leading to my arrest was partly obtained from Germany and was of such character as to furnish incontrovertible proof of my activities. This evidence of course involved knowledge on the part of the Soviet authorities of my connection with Mrs. Harding in Berlin, including her assistance to me in meeting certain groups, so it was inevitable that if Mrs. Harding should ever come to Russia, she would be arrested, if not because of her former affiliations, at any rate for the sake of obtaining further information about me. The fact caused me no concern at the moment however, as I was convinced that Mrs. Harding was in England and engaged in work of quite another character.

"I was released on parole on April 4, 1920, with the obligation of appearing in person each week before the Soviet police. Subsequently pressure was brought on me to agree to work for the Soviet government. For certain imperative reasons I did not reject the offer but temporized with the Soviet authorities, always refusing to come to a definite agreement, and furnishing them with worthless information, thus affording ample justification for my subsequent arrest in October, 1920, and for trial and condemnation to the death penalty had the Soviet government seen fit to impose it.

"When I heard that Mrs. Harding wished to come to Russia, I was horrified, knowing her danger, and did the only two things in my power to prevent her coming. I advised the Russian Foreign Office not to admit her, stating that as they were only admitting a limited number of correspondents, they would find it more advantageous to give permission to someone with more newspaper experience, and I sent her a message not to come to Russia by a British correspondent then leaving the country. I presume that she never received this message. I was later informed that Mrs. Harding had received the necessary permission and was en route for Moscow, and that she had the highest recommendations from Socialists in other countries.

"Knowing as I did, that the police authorities had incontrovertible proof of our relations in Berlin, and access to still further sources of information, I was perfectly frank in speaking of them when questioned directly, believing that a single prevarication or misstatement would lead the Soviet authorities to believe that there was still some connection between us, and I made it quite clear that I had no knowledge of her movements for an entire year, and no idea of her motives or object in coming to Russia. I also stated that she had great sympathy with the Socialist movement in Germany, and I hoped against hope that she might still escape arrest until she had made her position clear.

"Evidently the Soviet police had some doubts as well, for Moghilevsky, the chief of the Foreign Espionage Section, was sent to Reval to meet her and to accompany her to Moscow. On her arrival she was brought to the house where I was staying and placed in my room, where I saw her for a few moments. I was unable to say anything of a confidential character to her as I knew that anything we might say would be overheard, and I was afraid of implicating her. She was accompanied by Moghilevsky, and feeling that something was wrong, I went into the hall and asked him what he intended to do with her. He told me that she was to be arrested immediately, and although I pleaded for her he refused to allow her to remain at liberty.

"From the time of her arrest in June 1920, until my own arrest the following October, I sent Mrs. Harding weekly food packages, the only ones she received during that period, and I sent word out of the country of her arrest. I only saw her once after that — in August. I had been myself called to the Checka to answer an accusation of having given certain information to a fellow-American, and had been under arrest for three hours, finally managing to persuade my juge d'instruction of my innocence. As I was leaving I was informed by the juge d'instruction that I would pass Mrs. Harding in the hall, and that I was to give her no sign of recognition. Knowing that it would be worse for both of us if I failed to ob-

"BLONDE," CITED IN AD, SUES AND GETS $1,500

"Don't Flirt With Glove Counter Girl," Is "Snappy Saying" of Canadian Store, but Joke Fails to Register

A libel action of unusual interest was tried in Hamilton, Ont., recently. On June 16, 1922, Stanley Mills & Co., Ltd., ran a page department store advertisement in the Hamilton Spectator and the Hamilton Herald. The advertisement said: "When you're told to go into a department store to match some ribbon, don't feel so abused you feel justified in flirting with the blonde behind the glove counter to cheer yourself up."

On the basis of this statement, Miss Edith Emma Garland, an employe, brought action against the company for $5,000, claiming she had been libelled.

Miss Garland contended that she was the "blonde" referred to; that there was an innuendo that she was of questionable character, and that the advertisement had exposed her to ridicule and insult.

For the company it was claimed that the statement was "snappy advertising" and that, along with other "smart sayings," it had been clipped from an advertising book.

The Judge ruled that the statement was actionable. The jury found for Miss Garland and awarded her $1,500 and costs. The case will be appealed by the company.

Against the mass of favorable [com]ment that the Herald staff says [has] received are two criticisms — [one] the size of type used in the mi[niature] and one of the apparent disadvan[tage] advertisers in putting the gist [of] news on one page. So far as is [known] no advertiser has raised this co[mplaint].

The small-type criticism was [met] Friday by dropping the agate for [the] pareil face set solid. Numerous [other] changes in the paper's scope and tre[atment] of news are in process and unde[r con]sideration, it is reported, among [them] some experiments with the Herald [pic]toric ship news department.

A Weekly Bargain Bulletin
For the Women of New Haven

With this first number of SHOPPING NEWS we dedicate to the women of New Haven and the shopping area near by a publication issued solely in the interests of women. A publication designed to save money, time, patience

Have you ever thought how closely the leading stores of a city represent the city itself? First the city makes place for the stores, but the development of the stores has a big effect on the city's growth and welfare.

A stranger, considering New Haven as her future home, asks three important questions about the city before deciding to locate here:
(1) Are the schools as good or better than elsewhere?
(2) Are the churches up to the standards of her former home?
(3) Are the stores large, up-to-date and fair dealing?

Many reverse the order of this inquiry. Some omit churches and ask about the theatres and other places of amusement. If there are no children they don't care about the schools; but we have never known of a woman who was indifferent to the shopping facilities.

Honest merchandise, honest prices, good taste, variety, services, convenience and personal choice seem to be the main points of interest when considering the grade of stores in a city.

There is still another prime requisite—the advertising with which a store extends itself to its public. The advertising must be truly representative of the ideals and intentions of the store. Otherwise it will fall short of its aim.

Right there is the chief reason for printing and circulating SHOPPING NEWS. To cultivate truthful, careful, accurate statement regarding merchandise and impress our New Haven Shoppers with the reliability of our offerings.

To that end the stores which have formed the company to publish this paper have drawn up a code of rules and regulations to govern their advertising in SHOPPING NEWS. We print this code below for all to see and appreciate. Every one of our incorporators have signed an agreement to faithfully keep this code, and one of New Haven's leading law firms has executed a hard and fast contract between the stores to make it binding.

Cleveland's Shopping News supplied the model and the inspiration for the New Haven circular, whose initial front page appears above.

Thus the Shopping News is brought into the city at a time when the merchants realize that their policy of bulldozing publishers has resulted disastrously for themselves. It is not a weapon, however, to fight the two publishers who are holding out for a just reward for their ability to produce results for advertisers, Mr. Hamblen declares. The stores are willing to resume advertising at any time in the Register and the Times-Leader, he stated, but not on the basis of taking both papers on in the same agreement. The right of joint action is reserved to themselves by the merchants, it appears, although Mr. Hamblen disclaimed any knowledge of a dry goods association and said that he had come into contact with no such organization in his work with the Shopping News.

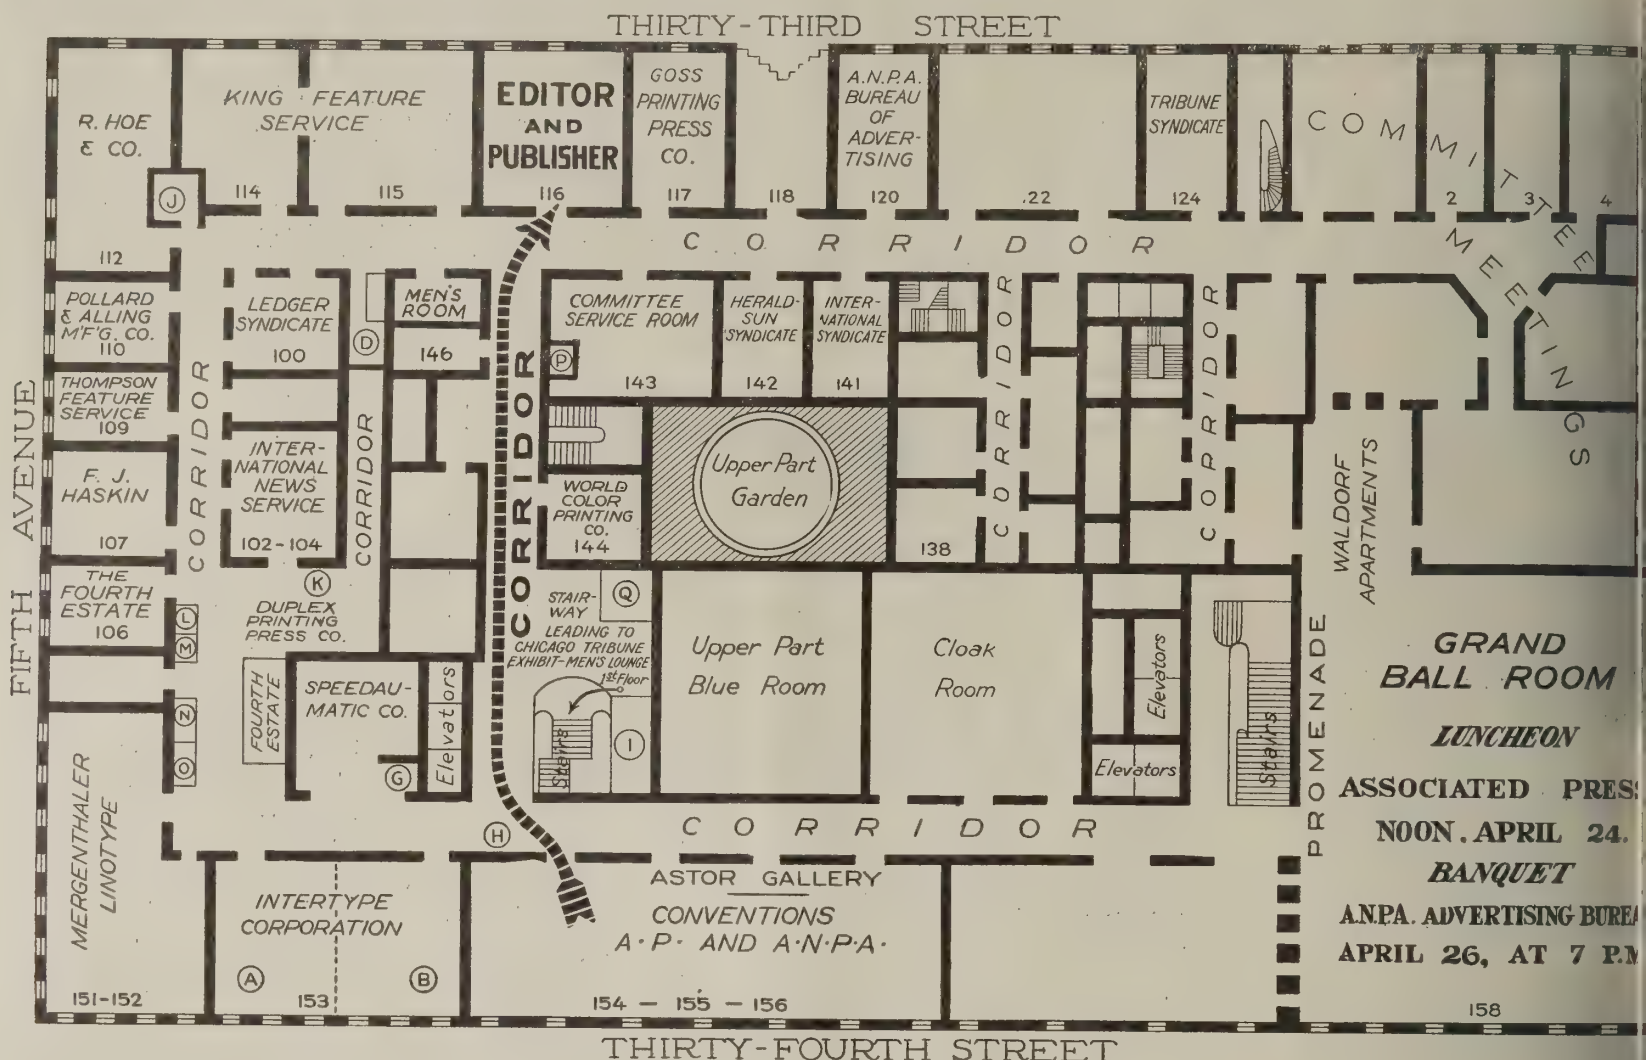
The cost of advertising per inch in the Shopping News, Mr. Hamblen stated, is less than half that of the combined rates quoted by the Register and Times-Leader. He estimated the latter combination at $1.80 per inch, which one of the publishers admitted was not far from the truth. This publisher also pointed out that this rate covered 50,000 circulation daily, which works out at $2.60 approximately per line per million circulation, considerable below that secured on local dry goods business by newspapers in other New England cities. There is still considerable bitterness on both sides of the controversy, frankly avowed by the publishers, but dissembled by the store officers.

A curious turn of events occurred several weeks ago when the Merchants Publishing Company's representative asked the Times-Leader to bid on the printing of the Shopping News. Mr. Hendrick figured on the job and the stores were willing to pay the price he quoted, which, according to Mr. Hamblen, would have netted the Times-Leader a weekly profit of from $200 to $300. After consideration, however, the Times-Leader decided to have nothing to do with the circular, holding that it was hostile to the interests of the Register and of itself and designed to assist the stores in carrying on the fight against them. The printing is now being placed with a New Haven job shop, which has no facilities for handling it and has the type set and the press work done in two different out-of-town offices, it was learned. Printing difficulties have not yet been solved, but the store managements consider them less important than the securing of complete distribution.

This was not secured on the first issue, Mr. Hamblen admitted, due to inexperience of the boy carriers employed. Some sections were not covered completely. Others were covered to complete saturation when a gust of wind saved one carrier the trouble of a house-to-house call. It is planned to put one hundred boys on the job of distributing the circulars, with a staff of inspectors covering each carrier's trail and rectifying complaints. It appears that the Cleveland plan of distribution will be followed to a great extent and it was stated that Sam B. Anson, who has managed the Cleveland Shopping News since its establishment, has been free with advice for the New Haven enterprise.

Questions as to the results of the Monday bargain advertising were parried by the advertising manager of the Shartenberg store as being "premature." Mr. Hamblen cited one instance in which an advertiser had secured four times the results on a bargain advertised in the Shopping News that had been secured from advertising of the same article in all four of the daily papers several weeks ago. He stated that the article advertised and its price were "substantially the same." He added that the article had been displayed in the store's windows for a week while the newspaper advertising was appearing. This store is not one of the "five" and is a regular advertiser in all four newspapers. Mr. Hamblen did not mention any other instances of unusual results from the bargain page, nor did checkers sent out by the newspapers on Monday find any unusual activity in the stores.

It is stated by one publisher that the dry goods business has been comparativtly dull since the two papers declined to carry the advertising. This statement was borne out by a casual stroll by the EDITOR & PUBLISHER representative through each of the five stores. Two of them had a fair complement of shoppers, but there appeared to be little actual buying going on. Most of the women—less than ten men were seen—seemed to be walking up one aisle and down another, looking for eye-catchers on the counters rather than in the newspaper columns where they had been accustomed to find the luring descriptions. In the other three stores many clerks were sitting idle behind the counters. In one store only thirteen possible customers were counted on the ground floor. These observations were made between one and five o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, which the stores consider their second best shopping day, second to Saturday.



None of the most enthusiastic proponents of the Shopping News idea have claimed that Wednesday business can be traced to the circular. It is generally admitted that results, if any, must show in the Monday business. What the latter prospects are can be gathered from the experience of one newspaper man who tried to secure several copies in his home neighborhood Monday morning. He called on seven neighbors without a sign of success—the paper had been delivered Saturday morning, as per schedule, but had found its way to the rubbish receptacle or the fireplace over the week-end. That, of course, may not be typical, but it is one straw in the wind.

Reports received by the publishers indicate that the number and names of Shopping News advertisers will show considerable turnover until the circular plan either becomes permanent or is abandoned. Those now using its columns include the "Big Five"—Edward Malley Company, whose president, Walter Malley, is also president of the Merchants Publishing Company; Gamble-Desmond Company, Shartenberg's, Mendel & Harris, and the Charles Monson Company; and also the following: Hadley's, a furniture store; W. B. Hall; C. M. Bradford, an automobile dealer; Thomas Motor Company, another automobile firm; Fritz & Hawley Company, opticians; the New Haven Bank, the Mechanics National Bank and the First National Bank.

It was stated by Mr. Hamblen that all the above are members of the Merchants Publishing Company and are under contract to carry their advertising in the Shopping News for one year. This was denied by two of the advertisers. It is said that one advertiser has already withdrawn from the proposition, with the claim that he had agreed verbally to only one insertion of his copy. He is not one of the five large merchants. Personal friendship and business associations are believed to have played a part in lining up merchants outside of the department store group as advertisers in the first issue and it is also believed that some of this class will find no profit in paying 80 cents an inch for advertising that will probably have no influence in getting

SUIT AGAINST KELLOGG DROPPED

Conklin Withdraws Charge Anaheim Herald Was Mismanaged

Suit filed last week by S. S. Conklin, business manager of the Long Beach (Cal.) Telegram and a stockholder and former business manager of the Anaheim Herald, charging that F. W. Kellogg, part owner of the Los Angeles Express and other newspapers, including the Anaheim Herald, had mismanaged the latter paper to Conklin's detriment, was withdrawn by Mr. Conklin this week with apologies to Mr. Kellogg. Nine charges were set forth by Mr. Conklin in his suit and a court order was issued citing Mr. Kellogg and his associates to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not be issued to prevent their performance of the acts complained of.

Immediately after the issuance of the order, Mr. Conklin withdrew his action and wrote to Mr. Kellogg as follows:

"I have instructed my attorneys, McComb & Hall, to withdraw the suit which was filed in my name against you and others in the Superior Court of Orange County last Wednesday. After my talk with you last night, I decided to dismiss the suit for the reason that I am convinced that you honestly believe that you are doing the big thing for Orange County and your associates in the Anaheim Printing & Publishing Company. Consequently I now regret that the suit was filed and particularly that my complaint was construed by newspapers as a reflection on the honesty of your dealing with the corporation. I did not expect that my complaint would be exploited in the newspapers to your detriment."

Mr. Kellogg denied the truth of the charges to EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

THEY ARE ALL IN THE DAY'S NEWS

Where's John H. Perry?" has been an everyday question around the office of the erican Press Association for a number of weeks. Here's the answer. Others in the ure, to Mr. Perry's right, who found Tampa just the place when those March winds r, are: Miss Marion Dixon, Albert Shaw, Jr., and Dr. Albert Shaw, Sr., editor of Review of Reviews. Judging from the smile, J. H. is very happy over the growth the Perry-Lloyd Jones string of newspapers.

Swinging throughout the South and spreading his business gospel of progress that can be achieved through taking the 1924 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World to London, F. A. That has always been the way in the case of women, but now we may have a change.

351,718,763 LINES CLASSIFIED IN 202 NEWSPAPE

Only Thirty-five Publications Reported Losses for 1922—Average Gain Nine Per Cent—Per Ca Average Lineage for All Papers was Ten and Number of Ads 1.1.

By C. L. PERKINS

Executive Secretary National Association of Newspaper Classified Managers.

CLASSIFIED advertising is growing. The 1922 Want-ad statistics of 202 newspapers show that they printed a total of 351,718,763 lines of classified advertising—a gain of 30,944,639 lines. Of the 202 publications listed in the figures printed in this issue all but 35 made gains in classified volume last year.

The total number of Want-ads printed by 127 of these papers was 36,132,064—a gain of 2,962,738 lines over the preceding twelve months. Of the 202 papers reporting lineage only 127 count the number of advertisements printed.

The 127 newspapers reporting both lineage and number of advertisements printed 248,681,883 lines or an average of 6.1 lines per advertisement. Of the 127 newspapers giving number of advertisements only 19 registered a loss over last year.

The average gain over the preceding year in both ads and lines was about 9 per cent. The average number of lines per capita for all the papers was 10 and the average number of ads per capita was 1.1.

In the statistics herewith the losses are indicated with an asterisk.

Those publications printing morning and evening issues, but selling Want-ads in combination, were requested to give only the figures for their morning edition in order to make the comparison fair with other newspapers.

A few newspapers printing appreciable amounts of classified advertising did not report their classified statistics.

The reason a few of these gave was the fact that they lost.

It is not the writer's purpose in compiling these statistics to either advertise the gains or losses of any newspapers. In nearly every case losses can be explained by unavoidable local conditions, rate raises, etc.

The writer's purpose in compiling these statistics is to give a view of the Want-ad field—to create in classified managers an ambition to make their papers appear higher in the list—to show classified managers what other newspapers are doing and therefore what they can do—to produce a directory of the papers of your type and size whose methods you should watch because of their classified progress.

The writer wishes to thank those who have aided in this work and to affirm his realization that it is impossible to compile statistics that are absolutely comparable in that newspapers do not have a standard system of measurement.

BUDGET CAN CRIPPLE A NEWSPAPER FACING REAL COMPETITION—ROGERS

Other Fellow's Rules Not Binding on Publishers Who Won Success, He Says—Make Income Pay Cost Plus Profit, Rather Than Set Tight Expense Limits

"MODERN refinement in the effective operation of newspapers seems clearly to indicate the acceptance and general practice of basing the whole program upon the cost of manufacturing a line or an inch of advertising," declared Jason Rogers, publisher of the New York Globe, commenting to an EDITOR & PUBLISHER representative this week on the recent series of stories on newspaper administration.

"Until our newspapers are ready to put into force a standard system of accounting through which the same items will appear under the same departments in all offices, no comparison of departmental percentages of expense will be of much use," he continued.

'The Inland Daily Press Association plan for producing figures for comparison of departmental expense among its members was suggested by me, growing out of an exchange of such information among a group of newspapers which I brought off in 1912, and which I described in 'Newspaper Efficiency' in 1917, and 'Newspaper Building' in 1918.

"While the averages produced through such an exchange of information are very interesting, I had hoped they would publish, for the use of members co-operating, a detailed summary so that through the secretary it would be possible for any member to investigate the methods of another able to conduct a department for a much lower percentage.

"I still hold to the theory that the item covering print paper should be eliminated from the calculation. It may be valuable to ascertain the percentage of total operating expenses represented by print paper, but in many cases the inclusion of this large item is apt to hide irregularities in other departmental percentages.

"I am not half as much concerned regarding a method by which a publisher claims to be able to predict the exact amount of business he is going to do for the next year and at what profit, as to be able to know what average rate he must get in order to produce a stated reasonable margin of profit.

"A business slump, a serious labor controversy, or absolutely necessary extra effort for business expansion may upset any plan, and all are more important considerations than insistent operation in accordance with any budget system. Too many are inclined to worship false gods while a competitor by disregarding arbitrary rules is cutting the ground from beneath their feet.

"I believe that to put a newspaper on a cost basis of operations is to provide the best sort of insurance against earthquakes or other contingencies. Over 100 newspapers have adopted the home-spun plan I have advocated since 1913 and every one of them is prosperous and has assured me that I provided means for giving them peace of mind through troublous times.

"For this simple cost system, to cover a month or a year, all that is required is a figure showing total operating expenses: the sum total of collections for sale of papers or subscriptions; and a record of the number of lines or inches of paid advertising printed.

"From the total expense subtract the circulation earnings. Divide the remainder by the number of lines or inches of advertising printed, and we get the cost per unit.

"To ascertain the net rate earned, take the net advertising charges (deducting agency commission and special representative's commission, if any) and divide by the number of lines printed.

"If the rate earned per line or per inch does not show a profit of 10 to 15 per cent, it is comparatively easy to determine what average rate must be produced in order to get upon a sound basis.

"I realize that in the case of a few very large newspapers, the advertising rate probably has no relation to cost, for the enomous traffic exercises an influence which makes it easier to reconcile rates with what the traffic will bear and take resulting large profits.

"For the average newspaper doing an average business, the basis of operating on a reasonable percentage basis over cost enables the publisher instantly to meet changing conditions, to offset some item of expense, and is a system easily explained and understood by business men.

"By setting up a very moderate reserve account from earnings over and above the amount of profit desired, to cover slight variations in operating costs, no change in rates is necessary until it is essential to go up or down a worthwhile unit per line or per inch.

"While many advertisers will pretend to refuse to recognize the fairness of basing rates on cost, it should be quite easy to show them that such a process will work more to their advantage than the basing of rates on quantity of circulation or arbitrarily putting them as high as traffic will bear.

"In my experience with advertisers all over the country, I have found them quite as human and more wideawake as to business advantage than the newspaper publisher. The merchant knows his business and makes money or goes out of business. The newspaper manager frequently does not know his business and is easily induced into water beyond his depth.

"Even in New York today we find leading merchants who think they are the important factor in newspaper production, czars and dictators in walled cities, who forget that if it were not for newspaper advertising, their business would soon shrink to the proportions of non-advertising stores.

"The best way to beat off the attack of those who would buy our advertising below what it costs to make it, and who keep so many newspapers in red ink, is accurate cost-finding. It will help to steel the nerve of the newspaper publisher to insist upon being paid at least the cost of production.

"In order to go forward and keep going forward, our newspapers must be able to take advantage of opportunities as they arise, regardless of arbitrary budgets or immediate profits. The accountancy-conducted newspapers are as sadly handicapped as one I was once on whose owner would not let us accept more advertising than filled 14 columns of a four-page sheet.

"The old New York Sun had been made a success as a four-page sheet; that was all the matter the people wonted to read; and we must get enough money for those fourteen columns to meet expenses and show a profit. Such was my paper's management's conclusion. It was a case of lifting ourselves by our bootstraps.

"A budget based on past expenditure, with liberal allowances for a promotional fund, to be apportioned by the management as occasion arises, is much more effective for conducting a real constructive building campaign.

"Arbitrary limits on sums to be spent by any department may have worked very well a few years ago; but in i competitive fields, the other fellow get away with everything exce office safe while the budgeted pap worrying about holding expenses the allowance.

"I hold that any community rather support with profit a worth creditable newspaper, in accordanc the quality of service rendered, miserable half-baked inferior p made by those fundamentally o with the theory of fixed budge inflexible regulation.

"According to my observations successful newspapers in many citi of them deserve even the meas support that they receive. The largely the product of men who ar stantly seeking a substitute for th thing and devoid of that degree o fidence and sincerity that wins and large enough recognition to get the corner.

"Nearly every big worth-while that has been done in the newspape iness for thirty years has been a plished by some individual of visio of great determination to put over conception of his inspiration.

"To adhere to fixed rules laid do those who have already arrived handicap oneself severely in the c fight. Real men prefer catch-as-can, no holds barred, in a life-and struggle. Those who already have are often inclined to half-tell how swear newcomers to rules which p them from doing things which really count.

"Joseph Pulitzer did not permit self to be snaffled when he entere newspaper arena in 1883, nor Adol Ochs in 1896. When we renamed t Commercial Advertiser the New Globe we sold papers to the newsb four for a cent.

"When William R. Hearst rushe New York Journal to 200,000 in a he gave papers to newsboys in as quantities as they would take aw sell. Pulitzer sold advertising fo cents a line. These giants made own rules. If they had not, they never have arrived.

"To be tied down by rules and lations which dwarf genuine news enterprise and competition is highl desirable. The average appearan the heavily-budgeted journal mak look inferior to a real newspaper of pose, and it is very poorly equippe a real fight. Cost-finding, like arbi budgeting, can be carried to extr which are painful and extremely e sive. I have no sympathy for the grown book-keeper who charges a thousand dollars to install a sy which enormously increases cost fo future time, and yet that is what of us buy.

"A real effective system based on ple, fundamental ideas can be establ and operated without an added doll expense. The figures that tell the for each month or each year ca carried in a book that fits the vest po With those figures covering two, t five or a dozen years the publisher k when circulation income is due for a sonal drop. He can apply ideas th the city and the season to overcom He's over the soft spot before his petitor knows there is one. His exp is subject to instant control in all partments.

"While reading the articles EDITO PUBLISHER has printed on this sub in the last few issues I jotted dow few figures on the Globe's income expense percentages. I took them the little vest pocket book I menti and they tell an interesting story changes in the newspaper business ing the past eight years. Notice the reader is now paying a larger s of the income than he was before war, while the advertiser's share is lo Note that editorial expense has incre from 15 to 18 per cent of the total pense. "NEXT TO MARGIN" NOT FULL POSITION PUBLISHERS' JURY DECIDES PUBLISHERS are always finding out something new about the newspaper business. Now and then one of the discoveries proves valuable, for instance, when a publisher learns that his paper is far more essential to advertisers than the business of any one or two of them is to his newspaper. But now and then the discoveries are just ingenious, like perpetual motion machines. They won't work in the face of established customs.

Take, for example, the claim of one publisher that he was giving an advertiser full position, all that an extra rate called for, when he placed the copy next to the margin of the page and told the advertiser that the margin in his case was equivalent to reading matter. The advertiser disagreed. The amount involved was trifling, but the principle was far-reaching and the publisher asked EDITOR & PUBLISHER to cite examples to back up his claim. None were found in the files and none in the collective memory of the staff, so the case went to a jury of experienced executives selected by EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Almost unanimously the jury agreed that the publisher's ruling was not in accord with established newspaper practice as they knew it.

W. F. Schmick, business manager of the Baltimore Sun, writes:

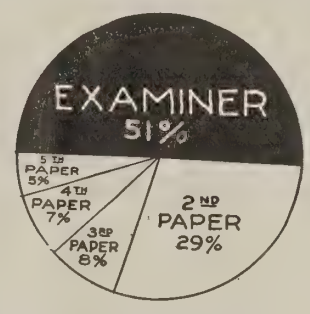
"We have never considered that the white margin of the paper counts as reading matter in the meaning of the full position requirement in an advertising order. We think when we guarantee an advertiser first following and alongside reading matter that the guarantee means exactly what it says. The margin of the paper is certainly not reading matter."

"The only position which the Philadelphia Bulletin sells is following and next reading matter," says William Simpson, business manager. "We have never heard that the margin of the page could be considered reading matter."

"Full position with us means either top of column with reading down one side, or following reading, with reading along one side," declares William F. Rogers, advertising manager of the Boston Transcript. "We would not consider that position following reading and advertising down one side and margin down the other quite met the requirements of full position."

"We would not consider 'next to margin' as 'next to reading,' rules W. H. Moore, national advertising manager of the Detroit News."

George M. Burbach, advertising manager of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, holds that full position is following and next to reading or top of column next to reading. "It would not seem to me," he writes, "that a newspaper was giving an advertiser full position if the advertisement was placed next to the gutter with advertising on the opposite side, as the margin does not carry the same reader interest as the news matter."



A. L. Shuman, advertising manager and treasurer of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, gives his opinion that "next to reading matter" means exactly what it says, and that he has never thought position next to the margin of a page would count the same as reading matter.

A New York executive who prefers anonymity, and whose newspaper experience has covered a wide range in Western, Southern and Eastern cities, states that he has always found that full position "meant either 'island' position or 'next and following' reading, the margin not counting as reading."

The only dissenting vote is cast by a Mid-Western publisher, who bases it on a single exception to his rule against selling position. He explains: "We do not aim to sell positions and when we do at all, we charge double price. Naturally that is prohibitive in almost every case and we do not carry it on our rate card. However, we have one such contract, which provides for top of column next to reading matter, even though the reading matter alongside is only part way. When the ad is next the margin, it is considered full position."

The San Francisco Examiner Overwhelmingly Leads in Classified Advertising!

During 1922 the San Francisco Examiner carried 5,306,686 lines of Classified Advertising —Which was more than that carried by the Chronicle, Bulletin, Call-Post and News combined!

—2,322,152 lines more than was carried by its closest competitor.

—3,294,242 lines more than was printed by all evening newspapers combined.

Further evidence of The San Francisco Examiner's Want Ad supremacy is reflected in the remarkable gain of 377,874 lines of Classified Advertising during 1922 over 1921.

—three times greater than the combined gains made by all other San Francisco newspapers.

The following lineage figures offer a striking testimonial of The Examiner's outstanding leadership in Want Ads.

A. A. C. W. TO EFFECT REORGANIZATION AT ATLANTIC CITY

New Constitution Will Provide for Executive Committee of Seven and Other Radical Changes to Increase Efficiency —Pacific Coast Favors Changes

THE National program committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World is now getting down to brass tacks in its duties of formulating the topics, discussions and speakers for the annual convention to be held in Atlantic City, June 2-6. Suggestions are coming in from all parts of the world, with the theme of how to reduce the costs of distribution seeming to command almost unanimous attention.

The proposed new constitution of the A. A. C. W., which will become effective at the Atlantic City meeting, has been sent out by the headquarters office to all member clubs, so that it may be studied prior to the annual conclave.

Some of the changes will affect every club and district. They were made after nearly two years of study and consideration by the executive committee.

The offices of the district vice-presidents will be abolished. In place of the present executive committee of 21, which includes the 17 vice-presidents, there will be a small executive committee of 7 members. This will include the president and the secretary-treasurer of the association, the chairman of the new board of presidents, the chairman of the national advertising commission, a representative of the affiliated women's clubs, a representative chosen by the sustaining members, and the retiring president of the association. This body will be a sort of "president's cabinet" which will direct the affairs of the association.

The new constitution creates a board of presidents, consisting of the president of each affiliated club or his appointee. This board will select a chairman from its members, who will be one of the seven members of the executive committee. The board of presidents will meet at every annual convention to select the place of the next convention, subject to the ratification of the convention, make recommendations to the executive committee and discuss problems peculiar to the individual clubs.

There will also be created a joint assembly composed of the chairman of the board of presidents of each of the 17 districts and one member from each of the 22 departments represented in the National Advertising Commission. This body will be made up of club presidents and representatives of each of the fields of advertising, such as retail advertisers, advertising agencies, direct mail advertising, financial advertising, poster advertising, newspaper advertising, and other groups within the National Advertising Commission. It will combine the points of view of local and district club organization with practical advertising practice.

It will nominate a candidate for president and another for secretary-treasurer. It will receive and consider all proposals affecting the policy of the association and its functions. All resolutions must be submitted to it before being presented to the convention.

It is the policy of the A. A. C. W. to foster and promote district organization and district conventions. District affairs will no longer be under the direction of a national vice-president, but under a district executive committee, which will choose its own chairman. This is covered by Article 9, Section 4, which says:

"The presidents of the clubs in each district shall constitute the district executive committee. Each district executive committee shall elect a chairman from their number. He shall be the representative of his district on the joint assembly. Each district executive committee shall have jurisdiction over district affairs, subject to the rules of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World and under the direction of the executive committee."

Another article, referring to representation, is Article 18, Section 1, which reads:

"Each affiliated club (except the departmental organizations) shall be entitled to delegates at the annual convention of the association as follows, and each such delegate shall be either a buyer or seller of advertising, or an advertising writer, or artist, or connected with a business or publication which buys or sells advertising, or advertising service."

Under the new plan of organization, each club elects a president. The presidents of the clubs in each district form the district executive committee. This committee elects one of its number to represent the district on the joint assembly. All the club presidents are members of the board of presidents, and they elect one of their number to the executive committee.

Those who have drawn up the new constitution believe the national association will profit by the smaller and quicker acting executive committee and that the work of the entire association will be promoted and safeguarded by the board of presidents and the joint assembly. The new arrangement, is to give more power to advertising men than to members engaged in other lines of business in the belief that this is as it should be in an organization founded to promote the best in advertising.

One of the seven members of the new executive committee will be elected by the sustaining members—those individuals or firms who contribute directly to the support of the association. The clause pertaining to the election of this member was specifically made operative on September 1, 1922, by the new constitution. Referring to the fifth member of the executive committee, Article VI, section 1, paragraph E., specifies:

"A representative who shall be elected by the sustaining members upon nominations by any five sustaining members. The said nominations shall be submitted by mail by the secretary-treasurer to the sustaining members for the current year at least sixty days prior to the annual convention, provided that no sustaining member whose subscription is in arrears more than ninety days shall be entitled to a vote. The ballot shall be returned by mail to the secretary-treasurer. He shall immediately inform the successful candidate of his election."

Although elected by vote of the sustaining members, it is apparently unnecessary for the candidate himself to be a sustaining member.

The new plan of reorganization will affect particularly the advertising men and women on the Pacific Coast, who have built up their own Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs Association and have been known in the A. A. C. W. as Districts 12 and 13. In the past, there has not been the close co-operation between the P. C. A. C. A. and the A. A. C. W. that the latter body would have liked or those who have had the best interests of advertising at heart desired. During the past year or so, however, an understanding satisfactory to both organizations has been arrived at and, according to the plan submitted by the vice-president of District 13 of the A. A. C. W. and recently approved by the directors of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs Association, the latter organization will, in June, become the western district of the former. The president of the P. C. A. C. A. is so chosen that he will, under the new constitution of the national association, automatically become the coast representative on the national joint assembly. The two present coast districts of the national association will be abolished and in their place will be substituted substantially the same territory as that represented by the P. C. A. C. A., which will become the new and only Pacific Coast district.

The P. C. A. C. A. vice-president will be elected as at present and compose the cabinet of the coast president. The latter will be chosen by the presidents of the coast clubs, or their representatives, from one of their own number.

Here Is a First-Class Motto

First-Class News Gatherers Originated It.

Copyright, 1923, by Star Company.

"Get It FIRST—but FIRST Get It RIGHT"

That is the motto of the International News Service, which supplies news of all the world to hundreds of newspapers, and which, because it DOES get the news FIRST and gets it RIGHT, has been growing with extraordinary rapidity for several years past.

The International News Service motto ought to be posted up in every classroom of every "School of Journalism."

Every newspaper man, young and old, knows that the life of a newspaper is NEWS and that the life of news is GETTING IT FIRST.

Many men, especially the young and enthusiastic, are apt to forget that getting it RIGHT is even more important than getting it FIRST, although a combination of the two, RIGHT and FIRST, is the combination that builds up great newspapers and great newspaper men.

The success of the International News, which, by the way, has been greater during the last three months than ever before in its history, has been based on its news qualities.

Its growth comes of energy, forever on the alert, that first GETS the news, and of painstaking care and conservative policy, that demands that with the news FIRST shall come proof that it is the news RIGHT, in addition to being first.

For every dean of a school of journalism there could be no better text for a lecture to the boys and the girls of the school than the motto of the International News Service:

BRITISH JOURNALIST'S BOOK SETS NEW STANDARD IN MANUALS

It Is a Mirror of Modern English Practice and Teems With Vital Facts of Journalistic Profession and Newspaper Production

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

THERE are dozens of books that tell a man how to put words together with a picture in a border to make an advertisement and a fortune; but there has never yet been a book that showed how to string words together between column rules and make a newspaper and a fortune.

Maybe it is easier to tell how to make a fortune out of advertising than out of a newspaper. Or maybe an advertising man gets so used to selling things that when he comes to a loose end he just has to sell the selling idea itself, while a journalist so often finds it a heartbreaking job to sell what he has written that he has no heart left to make money out of the innocent, and his loose end is of a different kind.

So most of the serious books on journalism are stories of success or reminiscences of big fellows who have met people and done things that suggest success. But now a bold British journalist, Low Warren, has written a book, which he calls simply "Journalism,"* that takes one from the beginning of things journalistic, through all the stages of production, to the finished article in printed form.

Low Warren is a South of England newspaper man, who has edited and partly owned several seaside newspapers, held a literary post on the London Times, and seen so many varied sides of journalistic work that he enjoys a unique survey of his profession. And what he has seen and heard, observed and learned, he has set down in this book in exactly the same fashion as the writers of books on advertising do, so that it becomes a guide to journalism of a peculiarly intimate kind. For Low Warren has been thirty years at the game and in that time has seen the journalist develop from a mere purveyor of news to a moulder of opinion.

He has the advantage of a commendatory introduction written by Alan Pitt Robbins, news editor of the London Times, and Mr. Robbins marvels (as must the reader) at the manner in which Mr. Warren has gathered together such a mass of information on almost every conceivable aspect of the journalist's calling. Mr. Warren writes primarily for the beginner who would be a journalist, and, accordingly, his book opens with some sage advice to parents and others upon the prospects of journalism as a profession. He traces through the first three or four chapters the essential qualifications of a would-be journalist and takes a passing glimpse at newspapers as Julius Cæsar and similar pioneer hands saw them.

But, leaving the elementary chapters, there is much in the book that will intrigue and fascinate even journalists who think they know it all. The junior reporter is the starting point and Mr. Warren stands over him with helpful suggestions and inspiring thoughts as he shows him how his work is developed and shepherds him into advancement. So, step by step, the junior is conducted through the reportorial stages, put on to district and specials, interviewing to fill in, subediting, news-getting and news-service building, up to the onerous job of filling an editorial chair.

Now, if all this were done in the same way that many advertising manuals are written, it would be the dullest stuff imaginable. But as Low Warren treats it there is a vast amount of practical sense and good sound workmanship packed away, and this is where the book will get across to the newspaper man who is living the life today. He may not want hints and tips, but the very fashion in which the book is developed breeds the feeling, before more than a few pages have been covered, that it is the reader's own story with the names changed. This man Low Warren is in it, all up to his neck.

For it is the thousand and one little interpolations made by the author that transform what might have proved a dull textbook of journalistic whys and wherefores into a romantic record of realities. For example, a chapter on the function of the sub-editor is enlivened by many journalistic jokes. Here is told the famous story of the news cable concerning the Governor of Queensland's ceremonial turning of the first sod of the Maryborough Railway. As received in London, the cable read:

"NEW — RAILWAY — BEGUN — MARYBOROUGH — GOVERNOR — TWINS — FIRST — SON."

A mystified "sub" made two news items out of this—one regarding the new railway, the other concerning the birth of twins to the wife of the Governor—who was, as it happened, a widower.

Here, too, we are reminded of the daily habit of the old London Morning Advertiser to compose its contents bills of alliterative lines—a feature that secured a very useful meed of publicity for the paper.

Similarly, when discussing the place of dramatic and other criticism in a newspaper, Mr. Warren remarks upon the oft-repeated question: Why should those who cannot create take upon themselves to estimate the value of creative work? and provides his own answer. He says that if not a single fragment of art criticism had come down from Hellenic days, it would be none the less true that the Greeks were a nation of art critics and that they invented the criticism of art just as they invented the criticism of everything else.

Mr. Warren says that the editor of a great metropolitan daily, though he may not take any big personal part in preparing the contents of his paper, exercises an indisputable and subtle influence upon all essentials that pertain to its welfare.

He tells of great men of the past who have graduated from the newspaper office—Lord Salisbury, who became Prime Minister after writing leading articles for the Standard; the late Poet Laureate, Alfred Austin, on the same paper; Lord Morley, a Cabinet Minister who was actually called to that post while engaged in writing a leader for the Pall Mall Gazette, and who accepted the job and went back and finished his leader!

The newspaper of the future is a fascinating field of speculation touched upon, and it is interesting to note that Mr. Warren considers that journalism may undergo vast changes in its organic structure, in the not distant future, changes which may revolutionize the whole institution of the press as we know it today; and he adds that if it does it will almost certainly be in response to the newspaper movement in America.

All in all, besides being one of the most comprehensive guides to practice and professional work, Mr. Warren's book is a most valuable contribution to the great classics in literature.

He has given journalists a book of life, vital, forceful, practical, and teeming with interest. I am told it took five years to write; it will live for ten times that period, for it holds the mirror up to journalistic conditions as they have developed over the years which saw the press spring from a potential force into a world ence. It is a book for every rea EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

OHIO CIRCULATION MANAGERS LISTEN TO EDITOR'S ADVICE

The Newspaper's Purpose, Subject of Grove Patterson's Address, in Which He Urges Need of Co-operation of Departments

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

TOLEDO, O., April 11.—Discussion, of many problems, from the handling of newsboys to the most efficient method of marketing papers, occupied Ohio circulation managers in their semi-annual meeting in the Hotel Secor here today.

Grove Patterson, directing editor of the Toledo Blade and the Newark (N. J.) Star Eagle, formerly with the Detroit Journal, in one of the most important addresses, told what an editor can do for circulation. He traced newspapers from their earliest history to the present and described some of the hardships of old time editors.

"It is because of the ingenuity of these early papers," he said, "that we are so advanced today.

"Now, I suppose the thing all papers want to know are these: First, what the public is interested in; second, how shall publishers make their newspapers a service as well as a news medium; third, newspaper ideals; and, fourth, the necessity of co-operation between departments.

"A man of very wide experience said to me a few months ago that people are mostly interested in weather, fire and domestic entanglements. He meant just this: That people are interested in ordinary, every day things. I think a mistake a lot of us are making in the editorial end is to play the things men are interested in—pictures of bathing girls and the like, the abnormal sex appeal, forgetting we must sell our papers to women.

"The afternoon paper must, first of all, please the woman to be successful, and then, in a very shortsighted way, we proceed to smash in our columns stuff that appeals to men. Now I suggest woman is more interested in fashions than she is in looking at bathing girls.

"I think the value of pictures is very largely over-estimated. A picture must be judged on its news merits. If it has significance, if there is a feature to it, then it is a very interesting kind of news, but a picture which does not have news has no merit. I insist a picture should be judged as a news item and as a news story.

"In the second place, the service: I have the feeling that it is not sufficient for a newspaper to be simply a medium for the purveying of information at two cents a copy. It must build itself into its community as a service institution and must begin with the telephone girl and office boy and extend all the way to the publisher. From the telephone girl and the office boy up they must spare no pains to answer every question seriously, courteously and carefully.

"Third, the ideals of a newspaper. I get a little tired of having people say, 'Why don't you attack this and that.' I deny a newspaper is a public utility on which they can ride. We have a right to print what we will and express what we will. Some people regard the newspaper as a public utility. It is not.

"It is private—organized for profit. At the same time, it will never be great unless it has ideals.

"And fourth, co-operation: I regard a newspaper (speaking as an editor) not as something to be built by an editorial department and then dumped over to the circulation department to sell. Rather I feel this way: that the circulation manager and the editor and all other department heads are engaged in building a product and that we are all engaged equally in building it and all equally engaged in making it saleable and all engaged equally in selling it.

"When you go home, go to your editor, tell him you want him to put salesmen on the copy desk, and all the way through, and tell him you want him to be a salesman, too.

"I think the newspaper success is going to be greater in the future than it has at any time past because of the co-operation which I feel is coming between departments and which we have not had in the past. You circulation managers ought to be editors of the street editions. You ought to go in to your editor and say, 'Now, here is a story I would like to have played. I can sell that.' First, you have to sell him, but he probably will see it your way."

Local legislation against young newsboys was discussed and it was brought out that such measures have been introduced in several cities in Ohio. They have largely been sponsored by women's organizations. The circulation men felt it would work a hardship, not only on the boys, but on newspapers as well, if the minimum is placed at 16 years, which is being tried in some places.

R. M. Bird, superintendent of railway mails, Cincinnati, pledged co-operation with newspapers in seeing that their bundles are delivered as early as possible. He urged that each circulation manager have his man take great care to see that bundles were wrapped and tied properly and that the addresses were correct.

J. J. Lynch, president of the International Circulation Managers Association, urged all Ohio men to join the international association.

The Central States Circulation Managers' Association will hold its semi-annual meeting April 24 at the LaSalle Hotel, Chicago. The Hochi's Magnificent New Building Just Completed in the Heart of Tokyo

THE HOCHI SHIMBUN

Japan's Oldest Evening Newspaper With Large Morning Edition

TOTAL PAID CIRCULATION LARGEST IN TOKYO

The Hochi Shimbun was established in 1872 by the late Marquis Okuma, and continuously since that early date has lent all its influence to the support of its great founder's lofty ideals.

In the foreign news field the Hochi has built up a service which is unexcelled, and which has earned for it many readers who are intensely interested in persons and events abroad. This interest has been found to exert considerable influence on their taste in the purchase of imported commodities and undoubtedly has increased their consumption of products from abroad.

IN OUR OWN WORLD OF LETTERS

By Dr. JAMES MELVIN LEE

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for April features on its cover "The Interviewer and the Interviewed"—the anonymous confession of a woman reporter. The editor's blurb says that the anonymous author has been called by Sir Philip Gibbs "the best interviewer in America," and that for the past 15 years she has been a member of the staffs of morning, evening and Sunday newspapers in several large American cities. In recommending articles for perusal by readers of the EDITOR AND PUBLISHER, I am tempted to mark this article dealing with adventures in human nature "Must." Its author does well to emphasize that no one is either blackjacked or blackmailed into giving an interview, but that it is entirely a matter of free will—a fact too often overlooked by critics of the press. One of the cleverest things of the article is a quotation from one of the author's editorial friends, "A good interview, like all Gaul"—no pun intended—"is divided into three parts: One third what the interviewer says; one-third what he tried to say; one-third what he ought to have said." The author overlooks the postscript of her own, "What I made him say." The most practical part of the article is how she gets those interviewed to say what is wanted by the city editor.

EDWARD W. BOK in the Atlantic Monthly for April heads his article "The Ways of a Man in the Mart." In brief, it is a chapter from the biography of Cyrus H. K. Curtis, the publisher of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and several magazines. According to Mr. Bok, Mr. Curtis says to his editors, "Give the public the best. It knows. The cost is secondary." To his circulation managers, he says, "Keep the magazines before the public and make it easy for the public to get them." And to his advertising men he says, "We know we give the advertisers their money's worth, but it is up to you to prove it to them." The present contribution by Mr. Bok is the third of a series about Mr. Curtis, and probably the last to appear in the Atlantic Monthly, as a book containing all of the chapters is announced for early publication.

ERNEST ELMO CALKINS is fast becoming a man of "ads and letters." To Scribner's Magazine for March, he contributed "Advertising's Ingratiating Smile," remarkable for its literary charm and genial humor. In this chat, Mr. Calkins traces the history of advertising from his boyhood days when he saw on rural fences:

> "Job Had Boils But He Didn't Have

down through a succession of stages of what might be called styles in advertising. These included: The imaginary character, the jingle, the reason why, double page spread, and the research-data. His comment is that "in the meanwhile, advertising survived them all and managed to progress." One wonders what principle Mr. Calkins used in determining whether he would be specific in naming advertised brands. Possibly for the first time in the text a magazine mentions "Force," "Camel Cigarettes," "Sapolio," "The Road of Anthracite," "Big Ben Alarm Clock," "Mennen Talcum," etc. In a few cases, names of advertisers have been omitted. The members of the editorial staff will not be contaminated by "advertising's ingratiating influence" even if they read the article.

ADVERTISERS WHO WOULD LIKE DATA about the pulling power of the EDITOR AND PUBLISHER should drop a line to the secretary of church activities, Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth avenue and 29th street, New York City. Attention was recently called by its pastor to a printed sermon, "Wanted—A Newspaper." That issue has been completely exhausted because of the many requests from editors. The sermon, however, will be reprinted in the Washington Newspaper published by the School of Journalism at the State University in Washington. Copies of the issue containing this sermon can doubtless be obtained upon application to M. Lyle Spencer, director of the School of Journalism, Washington State University, Seattle.

DON C. SEITZ, of the New York Evening World, is a man of many interests. He not only writes poetry that has a message for the reader but he can write a book review remarkable for its critical qualities. His review of "The Evening Post—A Century of Journalism" in the Nation for February 28, 1923, is an illustration. The same issue of the Nation contains an editorial, "More Newspaper Cannibalism," that ought to arouse considerable controversy. It is based on the suspension of the Dispatch and the Leader in Pittsburgh. The editorial "views with alarm" such consolidations of newspapers and their alleged control by "vested interests." The same arguments that can be brought against the mergers of newspapers, however, can be brought against the union of churches into one strong community church, and the consolidation of ungraded schools in rural communities into one large educational plant to which students are brought by public conveyances. Under certain conditions, one strong paper ably edited is much better for a community than several struggling papers subsidized by private individuals with personal and political aspirations. The danger lies in the coming years that journalism may become a closed field with a sign "No Trespassing." But until the other phrase is added, "under penalties of the law," the man with a strong personality can still find a way to publish a paper.

BECAUSE ALEXANDER HAMILTON was such a frequent contributor to the press of his time and because he was interested in newspaper enterprises, any book about him is of special interest to newspaper men. Arthur Hendrick Vandenberg, editor of the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald, is such an admirer of Hamilton that he has published another book about the first Secretary of the Treasury. This book, "If Hamilton Were Here Today" (G. P. Putnam's Sons), sets forth how Hamiltonian principles can be applied in the solution of modern problems. Mr. Vandenberg has done an excellent piece of interpretive work. If at times he is overzealous in his praise of Hamilton, he may be pardoned, because he regards Hamilton as "the greatest American." As a matter of fact, the title of his former book was "The Greatest American, Alexander Hamilton."

A RETAILER who consents to stock a product upon the manufacturer's promise that "we're going to create demand among your customers with a big newspaper advertising campaign" has a right to expect that that promise will be carried out literally.

And when a manufacturer, buying space solely on a circulation basis, employs newspapers with a high percentage of duplicated circulations, big country circulations, and combined circulations which fall far short of coverage, he doesn't play fair with the city dealer.

St. Louis and its environs, a compact market with thousands of progressive retailers, is the primary consideration of advertisers seeking to develop business in this territory. It is thoroughly covered, and most economically, only by a combination of the two principal evening papers.

Other deficiencies in appearance are marked, but are probably temporary. The heading, for instance, was apparently made for an eight-column wide sheet, with the title flanked on both sides by a torch and the words "Guaranteed Values." The finished product, as can be seen from the reproduction, is the equivalent of a seven column paper with columns of 14 pica ems, and the heading has only one flanking torch. The printer sawed the other off to fit the chases.

All those details will be worked out soon, Mr. Hamblen believes, as he expects that the final result of the Shopping News will be to stimulate sales so greatly that the amount available for advertising will be measurably increased. There is no intention to cut down on the newspaper space now being used, he stated, but measurements made by one of the publishers who declines to lose money on department store business indicate that the lineage of the big stores in the two papers they are using is 25 per cent less this year than it was in the same period in 1922.

Mr. Hamblen is optimistic. One result that he looks for is a realization by the merchants of the cost of producing a publication. They have looked upon the cost of making an advertisement as trifling, he said, and it might be possible that their eyes will be opened by the bills for their new enterprise. His hope, it might be stated, is shared by the publishers who have suffered from this conception of their business, but they are not losing sleep over the merchants' possible conversion. They know by experience that the merchants are not likely to give up without considerable further struggle a method that was worth $1,500,000 in 18 years. They know that the merchants have not only withheld their own business in an effort to destroy those who opposed them but have attempted and on occasion succeeded in diverting national advertising from papers in disfavor.

They know now that there is nothing in the superstition that department store advertising makes circulation. The Register and the Times-Leader, since their co-operation in this struggle, have seen their combined circulations increase 7,000 daily, a normal gain. They also know that the department store advertising carried on the old rate basis would thus have shown increasing losses.

They have co-operated in this matter only and have been in the keenest kind of competition with each other and with the other two papers on all other business. Neither they nor their contemporaries has ever printed a line to inform the public of the battle that has been going on for thirty months. People who read the Register alone or the Times-Leader alone have probably assumed that the stores have quit advertising and let it go at that. That the stores have suffered is proved beyond doubt by their willingness to put $80,000 a year into a circular that has a dubiously possible life of one day. Whether the fight might have been ended ere this by local publicity is a question that cannot be answered. That it will be ended by capitulation of the stores seems certain, and whether their own necessities, or a belated realization that a newspaper cannot be produced by the wave of a wand, are the deciding factors is immaterial.

The publishers of the city can still find opportunity to apply the advice that EDITOR & PUBLISHER gave two years ago — that they might learn a lot of things by a general comparison of notes to the decided advantage of all.

The advertisers' problem is one of grammar school arithmetic. They may learn eventually that it is better business to invest half a million dollars than to throw away a hundred thousand.

MONTGOMERY JOURNAL SOLD TO COMERS

Associated With Frederick I. Thompson, former Governor and Son Extend Their Alabama Holdings

Hard upon the heels of the purchase of three-fourths interest in the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser by Victor H. Hanson, comes the announcement that former Governor B. B. Comer, his son, Donald, and Frederick I. Thompson, competitors of Hanson in the Birmingham field, have purchased controlling interest in the Montgomery Journal.

FREDERICK I. THOMPSON

Mr. Hanson is publisher of the Birmingham News, while the Comer-Thompson interests control the Birmingham Age-Herald. The purchase of the Advertiser and the Journal in Montgomery intensifies the rivalry of these two organizations, which has existed in Birmingham since the purchase of the Age-Herald last fall by the Comer-Thompson combine.

Mr. Thompson also is principal owner of the Mobile Register and the Mobile News Item. The purchase of the Montgomery Journal will link four new papers.

Col. Horace Hood, founder and vet an editor of the Journal, retires from editorship, but his son, Brame Ho former advertising manager, retains interest in the paper and will hereaf act as business manager. Frank Har Miller, partner of Colonel Hood, reta an interest and will continue as p lisher.

Mr. Thompson will be president of company. A new editor was not nounced today. The Comers, who Birmingham capitalists and cotton m ufacturers, some months ago associa themselves with Mr. Thompson in purchase of the Birmingham Age-Her of which Thompson is publisher. Mr. Thompson will direct the polic of the paper. In his statement today said: "Editorially the Journal will st unflinchingly for wholesome respect the law and the control of Alabama the people of the state."

Colonel Hood, retiring editor, has l supported the political aspirations purposes of former Governor Comer, that the change in ownership proba means no change in the old point of v of the Journal.

Specialized Engineering Talent on Newspaper Manufacturing Problems

Research into newspaper manufacturing discloses numerous problems requiring specialized engineering talent for their best solution. The cost of merely stating these problems and finding the engineers best suited to solve them would be prohibitive for almost any one newspaper.

Even assuming the problems stated and engineers at hand—for best results they would have to be directed by an expert newspaperman and that would take an impossible amount of your time.

That is why I have brought together—focused—under my direction, engineers familiar with newspaper mechanical operation, and also have under engagement one of the country's largest engineering organizations for the allied problems of building design and construction. And organized the whole on such a scale as to be available to every publisher.

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla., April 6, 1923.

DITOR & PUBLISHER: I have just read itorial entitled "And They Call It Jour- " and I can not refrain from writing to most heartily commend it. It is brave, nd powerful. Such sensationalism is a nd does our profession great injury. It y that such character-cannibals can not to the penitentiary.

in this connection let me say that I e Associated Press goes entirely too sending out this sort of "stuff" called We have filed complaint with that or- on repeatedly about this stuff, but what little fellows do when the great metro- newspapers cry for the filth and the editors of the A. One Piece of the Big Job

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1923.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Just a line to express appreciation of the work you are doing for our profession. This letter is called forth, specifically, by your bully editorial, "And They Call It Journalism," but that editorial is only one piece of the big job you have been plugging at this long time.

It is a good thing for the newspaper business that EDITOR & PUBLISHER is willing, able and not afraid to take it over the editorial knee and spank it good and plenty.

The Mitchell case, insofar as the innocent wife and children are concerned, was a disgrace to journalism. Not all newspapers—probably only comparatively few—were guilty, but that any should dare is a reproach to the whole profession.

You have made clear, what we all know so well and so often forget, that a public crime is news for the reporter's pencil and private crime is for the pen of the Recording Angel.

More power to you.

WILLIAM B. COLVER,
General Editorial Manager, Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Inexcusable Journalism

HOUSTON, TEXAS, April 9, 1923.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I was very much impressed with the leading editorial in your issue of March 31st, entitled "And They Call It Journalism".

Your rebuke to newspapers (and their reporters), indulging in some character assassination ought to meet with hearty approval on the part of real newspaper men throughout the world.

It is certainly a reflection on our profession when men go to such extremes in their efforts to produce sensational stories. It is inexcusable, and your scathing rebuke was well deserved. I congratulate you.

M. E. FOSTER,
President, The Houston Chronicle.

HEARST IS WELCOMED TO BALTIMORE

Publisher Outlines Purposes of His Purchase of Two Newspapers in Southern City at Dinner Given in His Honor

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

BALTIMORE, Md., April 11.—About seventy men attended a dinner given at the Emerson Hotel last night to welcome William Randolph Hearst, new owner of the News and the American, to Baltimore.

Besides Mr. and Mrs. Hearst, the latter the only woman present, the guests included Gov. Albert C. Ritchie, Mayor William F. Broening, B. Howell Griswold, Jr., of Alexander Brown & Sons, one of the oldest banking houses of the city; Austin McLenahan, president of the Savings Bank of Baltimore; Daniel Williard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad; Herbert A. Wagner, president of the Consolidated Gas Company; C. D. Emmons, president of the United Railways; A. E. Berry, president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company; Gen. Felix Agnus, from whom Frank A. Munsey bought the American; W. A. Thayer, managing editor of the two papers for Mr. Hearst; Charles H. Grasty, formerly managing-owner of the News and now of the New York Times, and a number of Mr. Hearst's local staff.

Mr. Hearst's speech was his first public address to the people of Baltimore since he acquired the paper. He said that, since he came of southern parentage, he always felt, on acquiring a newspaper in the south, that he was "in a sense returning to the home of my forbears." He said in part:

"I know that Baltimore does not lack good and faithful service from the newspapers published here. I know how high those journals stand in the journalism of the nation. I know how capable and conscientious are the men who conduct those journals; how effective their service to the citizenship.

"But there is one form or phase of service which conditions may enable me especially to perform, and which I hope I shall often have the opportunity to render to Baltimore; that is, to unite the power and influence of the various publications which I have here and there at important points throughout the country in support of the things which Baltimore or any one of those localities desires and requires.

"In conclusion, let me say a brief word of the intent and character of my publications.

"You have probably sometimes heard them described as extremely radical. I do not think they are. I do not think I am very radical. Indeed, I sometimes think I have grown older and slowed down a bit; I am really not radical enough.

"The policies for which I and my publications fought, and in fighting got the reputation of being radical, have nearly all been accomplished—and, being in successful operation, are no longer regarded with apprehension. It is ancient history now to refer to the election of senators by the people. That policy did not rend the structure of government to its foundations, as timid conservatism predicted; nor did woman's suffrage destroy the fabric of society; nor have direct primaries upset the balance of our political processes.

"In fact, the chief objection to direct primaries is that political processes are not sufficiently different in the states that have direct primaries and those which have not.

"So that I do not at all feel that I am too radical, and my only fear is that a more valid criticism might be that I am somewhat of a back number.

"As a matter of plain fact, I am in some things an utter conservative, determined to conserve, as far as I possibly can, these principles of policies of the fathers which for so many years have made our country the freest and the happiest, the most prosperous and the most powerful nation upon the face of the earth.

"There is, however, one firm principle of mine which may be regarded by some as radical, but which to my mind is merely a matter of professional journalistic ethics—of common journalistic honesty.

"That principle is the right of the public to a square deal on all occasions—to a fair show for its 'white alley.' I consider a newspaper to be the retained attorney for the public, and I believe a newspaper which is faithless to that trust is as much of a traitor as an attorney who betrays the interests of the client who employs him.

"This may be radicalism, but it is constructive and conservative radicalism.

"It makes for the preservation of our liberties, the protection of our properties and the perpetuation of our American institutions."

"Big Four" Bloc Is Smashed

Voters Win Tremendous Victory and Establish the Independence of the Judiciary—Doremus Wins Easily

The judges' clique is smashed!

The great fight for a principle—the independence of the judiciary—is won!

Down to ignominious defeat goes the political combine formed on the recorder's court bench, regarded only a few weeks ago as the most strongly entrenched institution in Detroit.

Behind the "Big Four"—not so big today—were The Detroit News and the Detroit Free Press, and the now thoroughly discredited Citizens' league, together with the other local religious and commercial organizations.

✔ Against the bloc there was The Detroit Times. ✔

The fight was won by The Times first because a great American ideal was at stake. Secondly because of the brazen unfairness and the almost unbelievable stupidity of the apologists for the judges' combine.

The voters of Detroit are to be congratulated because they saw the principle involved in the fight and hit the offensive "controlled court" evil, and hit it hard.

They have demonstrated that it is possible for a man who is honest and who has lived a clean life, to be a successful candidate for political office in Detroit, even though calumny and slander are used against him. Because when the issue is clear-cut the people are usually not fooled.

It is not our purpose to add to the humiliation of the News and Free Press, but it should be said here today that their claim that the "underworld" was behind the independents in the fight against the "Big 4," was a miserable falsehood. They owe an abject apology to the electorate.

And while bitterness is not in our hearts today, but rather a great joy, it is necessary to point out that the Citizens' league has been repudiated as a fake and an imposition. This organization better quit. Hereafter candidates will implore it not to indorse them. And yet there is a field here for such body if it were made democratic.

So it has been with the newspaper feature, which owes so much to Marco Polo and which is now in a predicament closely resembling that of the great Venetian in his last days.

It is not to be overlooked that the newspaper feature is almost distinctively American and has played its part in our development. For instance, at one stage it gave our citizens a better understanding of life and customs in various parts of our own land and abroad. It even spread information, of a kind. It may not have supplied a great deal of knowledge, but it at least quickened interest in knowledge. Above all, it held the imagination of the people and thereby brought business and influence to the newspapers.

But the newspapers, like Marco Polo, have been unable to resist the temptation to exploit a good thing until it becomes worthless. Actually, the newspaper feature, which began as a harmless adjunct of the business, has virtually become the newspaper itself.

No department has been free fr contagion. So-called straight news

All of which would be fine enough

The value of the Better Business Bu-au of the Kansas City Advertising ub has shown its value to one firm least, according to W. A. Repp, presint of the Duff & Repp Furniture Comny. He told the Oil Men's Club that, ıce the bureau had been started, the ıue of his company's advertising had creased from 50 to 75 per cent. The l firms are being asked to give $1,000 ›ward the bureau. CALL PRINCE OF WALES TO LEAD MEN

Richards Advertising Agency, commander of the Post, presiding in a most ıble and vigorous fashion managed to :lear the docket of a good deal of routine post business before introducing William H. Rankin, of the Rankin Agency, who, in a happy, humorous vein, urged the members to support the Advertising Club of New York in its new building project.

The principal speaker was F. A. Wilson-Lawrenson of the Union Carbide & Carbon Corporation, president of the Civitan Club of New York and chairman of the "London 1924" committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs. He was introduced by Mr. Rankin and made a most enthusiastic plea for a closer relationship between the English-speaking peoples as of vital helpfulness to those engaged in commerce, in industry, in advertising and in publishing on both sides of the water.

"Already in England committees have been formed looking to our arrival," said Mr. Lawrenson. "Lord Rothermere of the Daily Mail has voluntarily subscribed $25,000 to go toward the entertainment of the American visitors; Sir Edward Iulton, proprietor of the Daily Sketch ınd many other newspapers, has subcribed an additional $25,000 and the Newspaper Publishers Association of London has subscribed $10,000—all this before a penny has been asked for. There s no doubt that if, or when, the invitaion is formally accepted, London will raise at least $250,000 for entertainment purposes.

"At the time it is proposed to hold the advertising convention in London, England will be holding the biggest exposition ever held in the world. It will be the British Empire Exposition at which will be displayed products and manufactures from every part of the Imperial domain. This exposition will be held at Wembly, where already the largest stadium in the world, capable of seating over 100,000 people has been built. It is there at Wembly that the advertising convention will be held and visiting Americans will have a unique opportunity of meeting marchants from all over the world; silk dealers from China; jewel merchants from India; coffee growers from Ceylon; ivory dealers from Burmah; rubber growers from Malay; spice dealers from the Near East; wool growers from Australia; pearl merchants from the Islands of Polynesia; traders and merchants from over half the world.

"And I am sure part of the educational value that visiting Americans will derive from such a visit will come from a better appreciation of how England has met the serious problems confronting her as she emerged from the life and death struggle of the great war.

"A friendly visit of a great body of representative American business men will do much, I am certain, to convince them and, through them, our country at large that we can profitably to both countries extend the business of each. Such a friendly visit will go a good way toward taking important commercial affairs out of the hands of the politicians and putting it in the hands of business men.

"The best advertisements for the U. S. A. that we have ever sent abroad were the 2,000,000 soldier boys w to France—thousands of them via don en route. I found they create mense good will for the U. S. A. cially those boys who had the oppor to visit English homes. Our boys ducted themselves so well and were fine specimens of manhood that same homes now welcome the tunity to buy advertised American ucts. I find Carnation Milk, I Milk, Pepsodent, Sun Maid Raisins sweet Prunes, Sunkist Oranges, ready and Gem Safety Razors, Co Tooth Paste, Goodrich and Goo Tires, many American automobile even Quaker Oats largely advertise successfully merchandised. The r is there for hundreds of other Am products and one of the results, that will accrue from the Londo Convention would be more U. S. A. ucts will be advertised and sold in Britain and surely many more advertisers will follow the footst Lever Brothers in their great succ advertising and selling Lux, Rinso, buoy Soap in this country, and Teas. This will mean more adve for our newspapers, magazines, papers, business trade papers an door advertising.

"I believe the world at large—a pecially every European country be benefited by the world adve convention in London in 1924 and lieve we Americans will learn a deal from such a visit and conv The London advertising men are this proposition very seriously an make good in every way to every gate who may attend this conventio

Unlimited New Type on Slugs

The foundry type system had proven too inelastic to take care of their varying requirements. Furthermore, foundry type was seldom available in complete series, much less families. The most used fonts were always wearing out, or running out of sorts.

In November they installed the Ludlow, which was in time to help them with their holiday rush of business. Now they have 19 fonts of Cheltenham, including oldstyle, bold, bold italic and bold extra condensed. These are lai in two 16-case cabinet each of which has drawer opening right and left a ternately. Four men coul thus be working at tw cabinets at once, if eve necessary, and turn ou four men's work.

CORRESPONDENTS BLUFF WAY BY FRONTIERS

Charlie—Good old Charlie! Hip, Hip Hurrah!"

When he descended at the theatre the mob stormed him. Pretty girls fought to kiss him, people tore buttons off his coat for souvenirs, his hat was smashed, his tie torn off. Burly bobbies linked arms and fought a path for him into the foyer.

But the real Charlie failed to attend that night.

Once a month the correspondent sits down to figure out his expense account. Back home the auditor sharpens his blue pencil.

Up in Reval a newspaperman was fighting fleas, censors and Bolsheviki in trying to cover the Baltic. On top of all his troubles came a laconic wire from his chief:

"Why is your expense account higher than that of any other man in Europe?"

The correspondent meditated, pondered, thought. What the deuce could he answer to an insult like that? Finally he took his Corona and hand, and wired the chief.

"I'll bite—why?" was his answer.

What an auditor considers "necessary expenditure" becomes one of the great mysteries of life. One of the biggest services in Europe will not approve expenditures made for drinks until the correspondent establishes that the drinks were part of entertainment necessary to get news.

Thus an auditor notified a field man that he had cut some $20 worth of drinks off a hotel bill turned in.

"All drinks on bill were entertainment," the correspondent wired back.

The painstaking auditor rechecked the bill, and discovering that in several cases only one drink was charged for, wrote the correspondent that single drinks, at least, would have to come out of his own pocket.

As the story is told, the field man wrote in somewhat in this vein:

"Dear Sir—Every drink on that bill was for entertainment. You mention single drinks. I should think this point would be obvious to you. I endeavor to save money at every turn. Therefore, when circumstances force me to entertain people in order to get news, I make a practice of buying one drink for my news source, taking only a free glass of water myself."

American newspapermen in mid-Europe, being paid in dollars, draw sums that are fabulous wealth in the currency of the country to which they are accredited. A Vienna correspondent recently figured out that his salary and expenses amounted to 500,000,000 kronen a year. In Germany, for example, President Ebert draws the marks equivalent of $42 a week. The Berlin correspondents rank among the rich men in the country.

Recently one of the governments realized this fact. They found that the American incomes put them, in native currency, in the wealthiest group liable to 85 per cent super-income tax. They gently hinted to the newspapermen that they wanted to collect. To the best of my knowledge this embarrassing question has not yet been settled.

Being one of the richest men in mid-Europe is not as good as it sounds, however. The 500,000,000 kronen man, who pays 100,000 kronen for a meal and 50,000 for a taxi ride, needs all the kronen the nation can print.

The American newspaperman in Europe soon loses any shyness about talking with Europe's great. He finds that Kings, Premiers, Dukes, War Ministers and famous generals average up as about the same kind of persons as bankers, society leaders, police court magistrates, desk sergeants and retired grocers. All quite human.

When requesting an interview, however, he always stumbles a bit over "Your Lordship's Most Obedient Servant," and the young correspondent always wonders whether to write "Dear Duke of Northumberland, Dear Sir—." He learns to say "Your Grace" eventually.

There is, however, the story of the efficient correspondent and the Prime Minister of Roumania.

The Roumanian Premier came up to Paris during some crisis, and flatly refused to see newspaper men. But he had a story to tell, so one American, hopping into a taxi, dashed over to the Roumanian embassy.

Pushing by the flunkey who opened the door, he walked down the corridor and entered a library. There was no one in sight, so, opening an inner door, he entered a sort of state reception room. There was a huge desk over in a corner. Behind it sat a bent white haired, fragile old man, busily writing in longhand.

This particular correspondent is a big, husky, square jawed citizen. He stalked over to the desk, planted himself, arms akimbo, and glowered down.

"Are you the Prime Minister of Roumania?" he growled.

The timorous little man huddled lower behind the desk.

"Yes sir, yes sir," he answered apologetically.

If the subscriber paid direct

Suppose that every Monday morning all the people who have a hand in furnishing your telephone service came to your door for your share of their pay. From the telephone company itself, would come operators, supervisors, chief operators, wire chiefs, linemen, repairmen, inspectors, installers, cable splicers, test-boardmen, draftsmen, engineers, scientists, executives, bookkeepers, commercial representatives, stenographers, clerks, conduit men and many others, who daily serve your telephone requirements unseen by you.

There would be tax collectors to take your share of national, state and municipal taxes, amounting to over forty million dollars. There would be men and women coming for a fair return on their money invested in telephone stocks and bonds—money which has made the service possible.

Then there are the people who produce the raw materials, the supplies and manufactured articles required for telephone service. They would include hundreds of thousands of workers in mines, smelters, steel mills, lumber camps, farms, wire mills, foundries, machine shops, rubber works, paint factories, cotton, silk and paper mills, rope works, glass works, tool works, and scores of other industries.

When you pay your telephone bill, the money is distributed by the company to the long line of people who have furnished something necessary for your service. The Bell System spares no effort to make your service the best and cheapest in the world, and every dollar it receives is utilized to that end.

MR. PERRY'S LITTLE JOKE

IN chronicling the transfer of the Clover Leaf Minneapolis property—The News—to Messrs. John H. Perry and Richard Lloyd Jones—EDITOR & PUBLISHER stated, in a most casual way, that Mr. Perry denied that he represented Mr. Hearst in the transaction, which was, we believed, but a simple statement of fact of some interest to our clientele—see EDITOR & PUBLISHER for January 6, page 18, column 1.

In reporting the visit of Messrs. John H. Perry and Richard Lloyd Jones to Minneapolis to take over the control of the Minneapolis News, EDITOR & PUBLISHER chronicled some staff changes and further stated that—"all interested continued to deny that William Randolph Hearst has any interest in the paper"—see EDITOR & PUBLISHER for February 17, page 16.

These stories were handled in the routine way and the men who wrote them and the desk men who passed them thought they had covered the items fairly and squarely and straightforwardly, as is the custom of reporting all news of the trade in the columns of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER. But Mr. Perry took exception to the denial part of the stories and said to the editor, in a telephonic conversation—rather jokingly, he thought—"how would you like it, if I were to say in my papers that you denied that the Scripps interests owned EDITOR & PUBLISHER?" or words substantially to that effect.

This is all there is to the statement in The American Press, house organ of the American Press Association of which Mr. Perry is owner, for April, reproduced in full below, that EDITOR & PUBLISHER is controlled by the Scripps' interests.

BROWN CONTINUES TO DENY THAT EDITOR AND PUBLISHER IS CONTROLLED BY SCRIPPS

EARLY REPORT OF OWNERSHIP OF TRADE PAPER REVIVED AGAIN, IS SAID BY PUBLISHER TO BE UNTRUE

James Wright Brown, President of the Editor & Publisher Company, denies that this trade paper is controlled by the Scripps interest.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER was first published by James B. Shale, who organized the Publishers' Press, a telegraphic news organization that handled pony reports and served some of the small dailies. EDITOR & PUBLISHER at that time was useful as a sort of 'House Organ" for the wire concern. Suddenly Shale sold out Publishers' Press to the Scripps people, who organized the United Press. Shale, however, continued the ostensible ownership of EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Soon, however, it was considered that EDITOR & PUBLISHER by itself was too small a proposition for Shale to devote his time to, and in a short time the publication passed out of Scripp's hands. Then there was much speculation as to whether Scripps had taken over the then 'house organ" of the Publishers' Press just as he had taken over the Publishers' Press itself, with the object of making EDITOR & PUBLISHER a "house organ" of the Scripps enterprises. A Scrips Publication, naturally, could not look for much public support from newspapers which were in competition with the Scripps string of dailies.

The report of secret ownership was not heard again until the meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association last spring, when the rumor was revived.

Apparently these reports have been brought forth by the evidence of the interest of Scripps paper in the EDITOR & PUBLISHER and the EDITOR & PUBLISHER in Scripps papers in the big volume of free publicity for Scripps' enterprises apearing from time to time in the EDITOR & PUBLISHER. This may be accounted for, however by the fact that the Scripps concerns carry in EDITOR & PUBLISHER a large volume of advertising which invariably appears in preferential positions, and this possibly might supply a reason for the repeated appearance in EDITOR & PUBLISHER of the news and free publicity covering the Scripps' enterprises and also the free publicity given to those persons connected with Scripps' enterprises who buy advertising in the EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Mr. Brown now claims to own and control EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He appears as its President and Editor. He continues to deny that Scripps owns control.

So Mr. Perry is having his little joke. In it he is aided and abetted by the editor of The American Press, Mr. Percy S. Howard, formerly president of the old New York Press Club, with the management of which EDITOR & PUBLISHER has felt impelled to disagree on many occasions in the past, the last editorial reference being on page 34 of the issue for March 31, 1923.

One of the framed mottoes in our news room seems to the writer to be quite in point. It reads—"there is such a thing as having a product so good that when your competitors run you down, folks know they're lyin'." This is equally true of reputation and character.

And now, you will pardon a purely personal word. When I purchased the controlling stock interest—51% of the outstanding stock in the EDITOR & PUBLISHER COMPANY in 1912, I had 8 minority stockholders, as the readers of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER know and as the Government statements on file with the Post Office Department will show.

By dint of hard work, close application and through the intelligent co-operation of an earnest, able, devoted staff, I have been able to improve our financial condition each year to such an extent as to be able to purchase, from time to time, all of the outstanding shares of the old minority stockholders in the company.

The first shares acquired were those of Frank LeRoy Blanchard; then Hunter, McReynolds and Hulderman; then George P. Leffler and George C. Kobbe. These purchases were made over a period of ten years.

In July, 1922, I initiated negotiations with Mr. Thomas J. Keenan, of Pittsburgh for his 90 shares of stock and with Mr. E. D. DeWitt for the 75 shares of stock that he acquired in 1915. And I am pleased to report that in December and later in February, both of these stock holdings were taken over by myself and the EDITOR & PUBLISHER COMPANY.

Every share of stock of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER COMPANY which is outstanding is owned by myself and is in my safety deposit vault in the Hanover National Bank.

The Scripps interest, or no other interest, has one single, solitary share of stock in this company.

My associates on the Board of Directors are the Department Heads of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Messrs. John F. Redmond, Ben Mellon, Arthur T. Robb, Jr., J. B. Keeney and Fenton Dowling.

Beginning in January of this year, we instituted a profit sharing plan whereby every employee of the company will participate in the profits of the concern in the year 1923.

Personally, I am glad of the opportunity that the publication of the untruthful and wholly misleading statement in the American Press has given me to state the case of the ownership of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER for the information of our clientele.

Character to a newspaper, as well as a class, trade and technical journal, is the one great essential—indeed, the first essential to success.

JAMES WRIGHT BROWN.

AN AMERICAN'S CREED

Compiled by CHARLES W. MILLER
Vicksburg (Miss.)

KNOWEST thou not this of old, since man was placed upon earth, That the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment? Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor; because he hath violently taken away an house which he buildeth not; Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly, he shall not save of that which he desired. The heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him. The increase of his house shall depart, and his goods shall flow away in the day of His wrath. This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God (Job. xx: 4, 5, 19, 20, 27-29). He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewise. Then came also publicans to be baptized, and said unto Him, Master, what shall we do? And He said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you (Luke iii: 11-13).

CONVENTION THOUGHTS

THE press agent and the propagandist will ag be among the principal topics of discuss when the publishers and editors of Ameri newspapers gather in New York and Washing during the week of April 22.

However, this problem, and it is a serious econo and good will problem, cannot be dismissed by m resolution. It is today a disease that is gnawing the vitals of militant journalism. The cure must st inside the press of America and it must first of be basically sound so far as the economic welfare the individual is concerned.

Truth must be the guiding force in the efforts the men who are to keep daily journalism a driv force for world understanding, national well-bei community upbuilding and individual liberty of cision; truth, however, is not possible if the individ journalist has to be dependent upon other sour than his profession for a livelihood.

The working newspaper man's independence fr the financial returns of press agentry and propaga is of just as great importance as ironclad ru against the destructive forces that are today kill initiative and strangling free expression.

There are too many editorial and news men, women, who are holding part-time jobs; the g that separates journalism and publicity is too shall The financial widening of that gulf to the point t will make its crossing impossible for the man woman of honest desires is the first necessity journalistic achievement for the public good.

It is possible that investigation would disclose t the new comers to the ranks of journalism are some cases being recruited from too low a me stratum with the result that a few are fouling nest. Nevertheless, an investigation of econo conditions and professional qualifications would b good place to start in securing freedom from present press agent and propagandist blight. E nomically, this is as important to the newspaper is contending for good will and success as the i vidual who makes service through journalism his work.

The most serious charge of the susceptibility the American press, as it is at present constitu to propaganda, was made when Admiral William Sims, commander of the American naval forces Europe during the World War, speaking this mo before the Los Angeles City Club on our part that conflict, said:

"The press accounts of the terrible atrocities w nothing but propaganda. The British naval rec and our own are filled with reports showing German U-Boat commanders aided in the rescue crews and passengers of ships they sank. If could not tow the ships to safety, they would alw by means of the radio, notify other ships of position of the crippled vessel."

Admiral Sims' wholesale charge against the p of American may be half-true or all false, but fact remains that the newspaper is the greatest cational instrument in the nation today and for reason it must be freed from the dangers of g to which it is now open.

A start along definite lines should be made at conventions of the American Newspaper Publish Association and of the American Society of Ne paper Editors.

THERE are a number of things of recent w of which the newspaper profession has a r to be proud. The New York Daily News has fo a state investigation of the slaying of Clar Peters, an under-dog, by Walter S. Ward, son of millionaire head of the bread baking trust; the N York World has torn the cover off the prison ca of Florida and disclosed peonage and murder; New York Evening Mail has been so successfu its campaign against crooked boxing that its eff have been rewarded by the appointment of a Lic Committee by Governor Smith, to control and r late the sport. E. T. Stotesbury, one of the r powerful financiers in America, appealed to owners of newspapers to save his son-in-law Kearsley Mitchell, from publicity, and was rewar by having his name printed on the front page practically every newspaper in the country.

What the Church Department Offers

The Church Advertising Department of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World is a voluntary organization of laymen and ministers interested in church advertising. It has no paid officials, few expenses and practically no income.

Its main aim is to help fill vacant pews in every church in the world, regardless of creed. It believes paid advertising can do much to further this end.

The Department holds an annual convention with the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World convention, stimulating church advertising by addresses there given and published in various periodicals.

Lecturers on church advertising are provided for local conferences where possible.

Copy for constructive advertisements of an educational type is offered at a moderate charge.

The president of the Department is Rev. Christian F. Reisner, D. D., 701 W. 177th Street, New York, N. Y.

We are feeding advertising ideas to your local pastor through denominational sources. Won't you bring pressure to bear from your end?

PRESS OF ALL LATIN NATIONS UNITE

Congress at Lyons Pledges Eighty Paper to Maintain Correspondents in Capitals of Thirteen Countries

PARIS, March 27.—The Congress of the Latin Press, held at Lyons March 4-8, brought together 80 representatives of newspapers from 13 different countries where a Latin language is spoken.

The congress laid the foundations of a movement which may play an important part in the affairs of the world. So used to criticizing the slow progress and doubtful achievements of the political conferences from which we have all lately been suffering, the newspaper men of the Latin races at this conference set an example which must make diplomats and politicians envious. These journalists from France, Belgium, Rumania, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Mexico, Colombia, Argentina, Brazil, Peru, Chile and Uruguay met to get things done. They left behind them in France a permanent office of the Latin Press (Bureau Permanent de la Presse Latine).

The movement began to assume definite shape only last winter, when the director of an important Portuguese paper came to Paris to invite M. Briand, M. Robert de Fleurs, Mme. Curie and M. de Waleffe to go to Portugal to deliver a series of lectures. Having succeeded in his mission, the Portuguese made known his ambition to see gathered together what might be called a Pan-Latin conference of newspaper men.

Three of eight important resolutions passed at the congress are of particular interest to the newspaper world. The first is the setting aside of a permanent space in each of the papers represented exclusively for news of Latin countries. The second is that preference shall be given in printing serial stories (a feautre of Latin language newspapers) to works by Latin-country authors. A third resolution obligates all news-distributing agencies to keep a correspondent of their own in the capital of each Latin country.

The congress also voted a resolution calling for the creation in the universities of a chair of modern literature of the five Latin languages. In the domain of common right a resolution was passed calling for the right of a lawyer of any of the Latin countries to be admitted to plead in behalf of a fellow countryman in the courts of any other.

One resolution passed may point to the birth of a new international auxiliary language among the Latin races. This resolution decrees that a dictionary shall be compiled of words which can be understood in all of the five Latin languages represented at the congress.

Among the resolutions which point to so much unity of view there is one, however, which may give rise to serious difficulties, and that is the resolution of the "right of reply" to be exercised by a country. Just as a common citizen in France, for instance, if attacked in a newspaper, has the right by law to demand that the newspaper shall print his reply, so countries attacked shall have a similar right to reply in the newspaper in which they are criticized, according to the resolution.

The congress voted that the next three annual conferences should be held in Lisbon, Rio de Janeiro and Milan.

The permanent office of the Latin Press is for the time being housed in the offices of Le Journal, 100 Rue de Richelieu, Paris, under the guidance of its secretary, M. Maurice de Waleffe.

Paper Honors Dr. Albert Shaw

In honor of the visit of Dr. Albert Shaw, editor of the Review of Reviews, to John H. Perry, of the Perry-Lloyd Jones newspapers, at Pensacola, the Pensacola Journal got out a four-page section devoted to welcoming Dr. Shaw and telling his achievements in the world of letters. The section was given good advertising support by Pensacola merchants.

MRS. HARRISON ANSWERS MRS. STAN HARDING

serve these instructions, I obeyed. As a matter of fact the only wise course for both of us, which I realized, was to accept the situation and to display perfect frankness with regard to the past, just as it was up to each of us to separately acknowledge our guilt or to prove our innocence of the immediate charges against us, and in this respect neither could have done the other the least harm.

"Mrs. Harding apparently failed to realize this fact, and before bringing her public charges against me made no effort to communicate privately with me. She remained in prison for five months, being released early in December, 1920 under the Litinov-O'Grady arrangement with the Soviet Government. I remained for ten months, being released under the agreement of the American Relief Administration with the Soviet Government for the release of all Americans imprisoned or detained in Russia as a necessary condition for the commencement of famine relief. I was deported in charge of Senator France of Maryland, who had taken a personal interest in my case, and was then in Russia. He had agreed to act as my escort, being responsible for my immediately crossing the border. Otherwise I would have left under escort with the echelon of American and other prisoners deported a week later.

"During my stay in America from September, 1921 till the beginning of June, 1922 I received no communications from Mrs. Harding whatever. Though I was aware of the fact that she believed me to have betrayed her to the Soviet authorities, I felt that it was not my place to offer an explanation privately unless asked to do so. When her public charges were made in July of last year, I did not answer them for the reasons already stated, but these reasons having been removed, I feel that I owe it to the profession of which I am a member as well as to myself, to make the above statement.

MARGUERITE E. HARRISON."

NEW YORK "FUTILITIES" GIBE OFFICIALS

Governor Smith and Col. Roosevelt Among Speakers at Albany Correspondents' Annual Stunt Dinner

The "Public Futilities of 1923" was given its first and last performance on the night of April 5 at the annual dinner of the Legislative Correspondents' Association at Albany, before an audience of 400 State officials, Legislators, newspaper men and their guests. Governor Alfred E. Smith, Senator James J. Walker, Speaker Machold and Col. Theodore Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, were the speakers, but their remarks were not reported.

The fads, fancies and foibles of men prominent in current political life were caricatured. The dinner at the Ten Eyck Hotel was preceded by a burlesque "convention of lobbyists" with the investure of Governor Smith with the "Order of the Sidewalks of New York" and distribution to guests of a ribboned medalion embossed with a view of the Governor's Oliver street home.

Then came the unveiling of portraits of State officials imposed on scantily draped figures of chorus coryphees, one depicting Governor Smith as the "Bubble Dancer" and others bearing the names of "Wanda Walker," "Lotty Lusk" and "Dolly Davenport." The "Political Eden Musee" was the next stunt, showing former Governor Nathan L. Miller arriving among the politically dead in a room the temperature of which he helped to cool and keep the wax figures of former Governors Glynn, Sulzer and Whitman from melting.

"You have had a rather unusual political career," Judge Miller was told. "Yes," he replied. "I was reared by Bill Ward, steered by Ward Smith, and queered by my own ward in Syracuse."

William H. Anderson was starred in the next skit, in which he was tried by the "Allied Reformers of New York," but was acquitted when he said he had made "preachers" instead of "reachers" of his collectors.

The Ku Klux Klan formed the theme of a cantata, in which ten robed and hooded klansmen told in song their plans to capture the Legislature and annex Tammany Hall.

"Mr. Mullen and Mr. Gage" was a comedy duo, with Prohibition as the theme of the song; a Scotch comedian, accompanied by a kilted chorus, extolled the potency of Scotch in politics, introducing Senator Walker in a song, "The Twenty and Six," a parody on the Gospel hymn, telling of his difficulties in keeping together his Senate majority.

The "Legislative Topical Review" was the movie part of the show, screening Governor Smith's journey to the corn belt to pave the way for his Presidential campaign; Senator Walker chasing his twenty-sixth vote all over Albany, and the "Babes in the Woods" (the Capital's freshmen legislators).

Bucks and Montgomery County Press League Entertained

Newspaper men of Bucks and Montgomery Counties, Pa., met at the Hotel Allen, Allentown, April 7 for the 26th annual meeting of the Press League of these two counties. Officers were elected as follows: President, William C. Watson, Bristol Courier; vice-president, P. Quinn Roth, Pottstown Ledger; secretary, Marco G. Bean, Sellersville Herald; treasurer, B. Witman Dambly, Skippack Transcript. Walter E. Baum of the Sellersville Herald was made permanent publicity man for the league.

A resolution was adopted favoring passage of a bill now in the Pennsylvania Legislature providing for publication of assessments and delinquent taxes. Charles B. Spatz of the Boyertown Democrat gave his version of "Ediewiamgbab," which turned out not to be a linotype line or Pennsylvania Dutch, but "Every day in every way I am getting better and better."

"We don't 'allow' these expenses. We pay whatever is necessary to conduct every department effectively and we make our income cover expenses plus profit. Stratford Beacon Deal Gives W. J. Taylor Three in West Ontario

With the purchase of the Stratford Beacon, effective April 2, W. J. Taylor, proprietor of the Woodstock Sentinel-Review, becomes owner of three daily papers in Western Ontario, the Chatham News having been acquired Jan. 1.

Mr. Taylor buys the Beacon, including plant and equipment, from the estate of W. M. O'Beirne, whose son, K. W. O'Beirne, has been engaged to look after the new proprietor's interests.

Stratford is one of the few smaller cities in Canada, supporting two dailies and there are rumors that the purchase of the Beacon is preliminary to amalgamation of the Beacon and the Herald.

DOLLAR PULLERS

Advertising and circulation managers are always on the lookout for new ideas that will increase advertising receipts and win new circulation. Your idea for increasing advertising or circulation may not appeal to your manager, but it may be just the thing that some other manager wants. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each idea printed under this head. The fact that the idea is now being used in your city does not bar it from the department. Address your communication to the DOLLAR PULLER EDITOR. When they appear clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable ideas will not be returned.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER receives a great many requests for the names and addresses of contributors to the Hunch and Dollar Puller departments from newspapers anxious to get in immediate touch with them. Under the system of using only initials of contributors it has in some cases taken us six weeks or more to connect the wires. For this reason better service will be rendered in the future if the following form is followed in the case of each contribution to the departments:—Name of contributor, name of newspaper, employer or home address, name of city, abbreviation of State name.

THE promotion department of the Cleveland Plain Dealer recently put across a "Derby Day" full page group advertisement without a bit of trouble, simply by using a dummy page one-half of which was taken up with a drawing of a Derby hat. An advertising man then inserted the names of six of the leading hat dealers of the city in the lower section of the full page dummy. He called on these firms and every one of them responded by agreeing to pay for an equal amount of space. The six calls netted him about six columns of gilt-edge display advertising. He never could have sold the same quantity of advertising to these firms, if the "Derby Day" idea had not been presented to them in an attractive way. The hat firms all reported good results from their page of "group ads." This "hat story" is but one which the promotion department of the P. D. could tell in the way of creating business. Very little type was used in the advertising of the six firms—their store name and business address was about all, except in some instances trade marks or trade slogans were included.—J. H. Webb, Cleveland Plain Dealer, Cleveland, Ohio.

Newspapers might obtain extra business if they could induce one or more of the leading markets in their city to give them a standing order to insert an advertisement on every day similar to the following illustration:

DON'T GET DAMP AND MUDDY
—Just phone "Blank 000" for Meats and Groceries.
We deliver anywhere.
(Name and address here.)

This copy should be set in bold display. An appropriate cut at the top of the ad showing a woman facing the rain, umbrella over her head and market basket on her arm would add to the effectiveness of this copy. Thus on a rainy day the business of the market who makes use of this idea could be switched from a counter business to a telephone business, and not a "bad day" at all.—George C. Marcley, The Republican-Journal Ogdensburg, N. Y.

The Quebec Daily Telegraph, Quebec, P. Q., Canada, spread the scope of its 1923 Spring Style Number to include a number of new departments, this making it into a Spring Number. Thus there were double trucks devoted to Automobiles, Building, Paint-Up, Music, Furniture and Market Basket, and even to Men's Wear. Each page carried a special head and appropriate reading matter and cuts, and was sold separately. Each was successful in netting much extra advertising, and the result was that the Telegraph carried 10,000 lines more advertising in its Spring number than any other local paper. The windows of the newspaper office were also attractively decorated a la apparel shop, with artificial flowers, fashion plates, and suitable inscriptions. The merchants were much impressed with the tie-up, especially since a photograph was made of the display and circulated among them. A style number can be used to sell other lines.—B. W. Keightley, Quebec Telegraph, Quebec, Canada.

The Omaha (Neb.) Daily Bee will stage a "better homes show" in the municipal auditorium April 20 to May 4. The auditorium will be divided into rooms and visitors may walk in and view each room. A man in charge of each room will give each visitor the exact cost of furnishing a room like it. There will be living rooms, bedrooms, dining rooms, sun parlors, kitchens and bath rooms to suit all classes of income, but all of them will be well arranged. The show will teach people how to add to the happiness of life by having beautiful furniture in their homes. Experts on home beautifying will deliver daily lectures during the two weeks of the show. Walter Murray, formerly director of the New York school of practical decoration will deliver a series of seven lectures.—A. R. Davison, 3624 North 41st street, Omaha, Neb.

San Antonio (Tex.) retail druggists, aided by the local newspapers and one wholesale drug house, have inaugurated a "Truth Campaign" to be continued for a full year. Advertisements will appear every Sunday. In one newspaper last Sunday four pages were given over to the campaign. Full pages will be used hereafter. In a nutshell, it is to be an educational series, stressing the service of the "registered" druggists. Sixty-four druggists are co-operating, each paying an equal share of the expenses. Any city newspaper should be able to induce the druggists to use such a campaign as this —Paul J. Thompson, University of Texas, Austin, Tex.

A batch of small ads sent in for a special edition is always a depressing thing to consider. More like the contents of a waste-basket than anything—and at first glance seemingly as worthless. To any but the experienced an interpreter would be necessary. Now, would not a little pamphlet on the manner and method of writing a small ad, distributed among prospective small advertisers, help to simplify their task and make the batch more presentable? With even a vague idea of display given the small merchant it is more than likely that his interest will take a new slant and bigger and better ads result.—William F. Campbell, 118 South 11th street, Newark, N. J.

Here is a hunch that your local paper will "eat up." From your news stand or book store or wherever magazines are sold find out what magazine leads in circulation in your community. Then get the circulation of all other magazines in the same way. Then from the International Yearbook number for 1923 of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER you can get figures about which magazine leads in circulation in your state and the cost of advertising per page in the various magazines. The Ladies Home Journal leads all other publications here in Liberty. How many readers of country papers know that a page of advertising in that monthly magazine costs $8,000 per page?—Victoria Adelaide Harvey, Liberty, Mo.

DAYLIGHT SAVING TURMOIL

Ohio Newspapers Have Troubles Due to Time Mixups

With the advent of Spring, Ohio newspapers are running up against the usual troubles due to adoption of daylight saving time in some municipalities, while others retain Central Standard time. The Associated Press has advanced the hours for operation of the day State wire from 7 A. M. to 3 P. M. and 6 A. M. to 2 P. M. Central Standard time. Provision has been made for those papers desiring to hold the wire for one hour after regular "30" at 2 P. M.

The time squabble has led to some unusual situations. Springfield, for instance, runs on Central time, while Columbus and Dayton, on either side of it, go on advanced time during the Summer.

Plans for the new building call for four stories. The structure will occupy a site 60 by 110 feet. A new $35,000 press has been ordered, which has capacity of 30,000 24-page papers an hour.

HUNCHES

Managing editors and city editors are always on the lookout for news and feature ideas that can be used locally. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each hunch published under this head. The fact that the hunch is now being worked successfully in your city does not bar it from this department. Address your contributions to the HUNCH EDITOR. When they appear, clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable hunches will not be returned.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER receives a great many requests for the names and addresses of contributors to the Hunch and Dollar Puller departments from newspapers anxious to get in immediate touch with them. Under the system of using only initials of contributors it has in some cases taken us six weeks or more to connect the wires. For this reason better service will be rendered in the future if the following form is followed in the case of each contribution to the departments:—Name of contributor, name of newspaper, employer or home address, name of city, abbreviation of State name.

HAVE the women of your town taken up horse shoe pitching yet? It has been popular among the men for a long time, but in some of the southern cities women champions are appearing, and arrangements are being made for inter-city and inter-state tournaments. If you can locate any women in your town who are enthusiastic about the sport it makes a good story, especially if cuts of the best players are used.—Cyril E. Lamb, 309 Ballard St., Ypsilanti, Mich.

A bill has been introduced into the New York State legislature under which the cutting of trees on privately owned lands would be prohibited unless consent had been obtained from the Conservation Commission. The prohibition does not apply to dead or fallen timber or the cutting of trees for domestic use of the owner. Here's a chance for a town to work for a similar idea. When the results have been obtained in a town, the idea can be developed in a county, and eventually a state and finally the country. Trees are being cut down five times as fast as they are produced.—G. Harris Danzberger, Hartsdale, N. Y.

How many communities have been christened the same name as yours? Your local postmaster will doubtless assist you in finding out. Write then to the secretaries of the respective Chambers of Commerce of the larger cities bearing the same name as yours, to the editors of newspapers, town clerks or school superintendents in the smaller places, and with a little time and trouble you will soon work up an educative series of articles that will prove of interest to your readers. We have found that the inhabitants of these places will be only too glad to assist you, and will even send photographs, if you desire them. The features of other towns having the same name as ours that we played up were, population, industries, resources, a brief historical and geographical sketch of them.—W. A. M., The News, Burlington, Vt.

Take a canvas, or run a questionnaire in your paper to see what kind of music is preferred. Publish the answers, if asked by a questioning reporter, anyway report the final votes to see which won out. Out of 72 persons in Omaha, seven had no preference. The violin won out over symphony orchestra by a vote of 14 to 13. Band 5; piano, 5; vocal solo, 5; male quartette, 3; pipeorgan and bag pipes, 2 each; and string quartette, harp, flute, cello, accordion and choral choir, one each. The answers of the 72 persons questioned proved to be an interesting bit of news.—A. R. Davison, 3624 No. 41st St., Omaha, Nebr.

Newspapers generally dislike to have mistakes constantly called to their attention, for reasons well known to newspapermen, especially the executives, but one Indiana newspaper not only likes it, but invites criticism. The best letters of criticism received each day are printed on the editorial page. There are two reasons for the move, the management says, first because it keeps everyone on the publication "on their toes" to prevent errors, and second, it "aids in a policy of education for the general public, which we believe to be one of the principal aims of the modern newspaper."—Bert A. Teeters, Lock Box 295, Springfield, Ohio.

The civic and social agencies of New York City are now working on a "Plan of New York and Its Environs," the purpose of which is to make the Metropolis and the area within a fifty-mile radius a fit place to live in fifty years hence. The project is hailed by men like Herbert Hoover and Elihu Root as one of the most important and progressive moves of the day, although it is expected that the surveys on which the plan itself will be based will be carried on for years. City planning in any form is a comparatively new and rare thing in America. Any newspaper can look into the affairs of its community and find all sorts of public work under way, all sorts of private building going on with no regard whatever for day when our children or their children will inherit our cities. Why not look to see whether your city, like New York, and like Topsy, or like weeds is "just growing up." And if it is, what better agency than a newspaper of standing to start a "City Planning Movement"?—Louis Resnick, 1421 Tribune building, New York City, N. Y.

Conductorettes are appearing again on the street cars in some cities. Are there any in your city? If so, find out why they have gone back to this work after being out of it since soon after the war ended. Surely in these days, when work is so plentiful, it can't be because the family is hard up financially. See what the women themselves say about it. Which do the street car passengers prefer to ride with—conductors or conductorettes?—Cyril E. Lamb, 309 Ballard street, Ypsilanti, Mich.

How many obscure manufacturing industries operate in your city? The Fresno (Cal.) Bee is running a series of weekly articles about the industries of the city that are little known to the average reader. Particular attention is given to those enterprises which embody features, methods or processes unfamiliar ot the majority of the people. Inquiry reveals interesting and often surprising things about even the best-known industries of the city, and few there are which present material for a most interesting weekly feature. A printing press manufacturing plant, a rug factory and the makers of rubber stamps are among the industries which have been described in the articles. Every city has similar industries, descriptions of which would prove interesting reading matter.—W. W. Mayes, Fresno Bee, Fresno, Cal.

THE SOUTH

THE NATION'S GREATEST UNDEVELOPED ASSET

The treasures supplied by Nature to the South were donated so lavishly that other sections of the country seem almost to have been slighted.

It has resources in coal and iron ore, petroleum, sulphur, graphite, mica, lead, zinc, quartz and asbestos, in marbles, granite and phosphates, enormous stands of yellow pine and oak timber; land so fertile that present volume of farm products could be doubled under intensive methods.

It is calculated that the two score rivers in the South which now develop about 2,400,000 horsepower, have a capacity to generate nearly four times this amount.

The Southern States are now facing an era of great industrial development. For many years considered a purely agricultural section, the South is now developing its natural resources and is preparing to meet modern industrial conditions in a most progressive spirit.

The South's rapid industrial growth has been the development of an expanding manufacturing industry at home to utilize locally produced raw materials.

The South, rich in natural resources, rich in buying power and rich in merchandising possibilities, is now developing faster and progressing more rapidly than any other part of our land.

Newspaper Advertising Is Most Effective for Local Use Over the Signatures of Local Dealers

That is why local department stores prefer the evening newspapers for use in creating sales and why the national advertiser desirous of similar results should do the same.

Lillums goes to Hollywood—and so does Harold!

CARL ED has just returned from Hollywood, where he accumulated atmosphere for the next phase of the hilarious adventures of Harold Teen; Lillums, lovely creature, is going to Hollywood, stardom bent. Harold, recovered from the catastrophe of Dolores' engagement (an unrequited devotion this) will resume the passion grande and set out in his dad's ancient flivver for Hollywood, Lillums, and Adventure!

Carl Ed is young himself. He knows the argot of adolescence. Therefore, Harold Teen intrigues the youngsters enormously, while grown-ups find a retrospective kick in every strip! It appeals specifically to a class neglected by all other cartoonists, yet who are the newspaper buyers of tomorrow!

Harold Teen, like all other Chicago Tribune features, was develcped for our own use. It's been immensely successful from the very start!

Give Harold a month's trial with confidence that it will make good.

THE ONLY features worth considering are those that will return your purchase price many times in the circulation they bring. Chicago Tribune Features do this! They built the largest morning daily circulation in America (The New York Daily News—over 600,000) as well as the second largest (The Chicago Tribune—over 550,000—which is 150,000 more than the third paper). The Chicago Tribune and The New York Daily News differ in many respects,—in age, shape, display, purpose,—yet both use the same FEATURES!

Vol. 55 NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1923 No. 48

PRESIDENT TAKES WORLD COURT FIGHT TO PRESS

Says United States Has No Place in League of Nations, But We Could Eventually Participate in International Association for Conference Without Sacrificing Our Nationality.

AMERICAN editors and publishers assembled round the Associated Press heon tables at the Waldorf-Astoria sday witnessed a display of political rage that has few counterparts in the nory of active newspaper men when sident Warren G. Harding in his ad- s boldly argued for the adherence of United States to the International rt of Justice.

he President went straight to the ple, taking advantage of the unalleled opportunity to plead his cause re the five hundred moulders of pubopinion who filled the grand ballroom the galleries to full seating capacity. one press table that usually acmodates the New York newspaper press association men at Associated ss luncheons grew to four before the x of local writers, Washington espondents, and special feature men. attery of photographers patiently exd their plates for several seconds be- the guest table in the face of the et Service inhibition against flashlight ures.

Members and their guests e all in place at 1.10, when the Presi- flanked by his Secret Service guards his service aides, Col. C. O. Sherrill Commander Adolphus Andrews, filed the room accompanied by President tes, Counselor Melville E. Stone and ph S. Ochs, sher of the York Times. rs. military touch d the openof the ballwhen the mess call oned the Associated Press from the Astor Gallery to luncheon. The President's aides were in full dress uniform, with the gold-lace epaulettes and aiguillettes of the staff corps lending their brilliance to the occasion.

There was solemnity and seriousness in this luncheon which was absent from the A. P. functions of other years. There was a feeling in the air that the President of the United States would not overlook his opportunity to clarify his much-disputed foreign policy before the largest possible assembly of the men who assume the responsibility of interpreting the Government to the people. Nor did he.

With only a few words admonishing the press that it would benefit by more accuracy and less eagerness, he launched into the heart of his subject, and most of the four thousand words that he delivered in the next three-quarters of an hour were directly to the point.

"Since I had the honor of presiding over our annual luncheon last year I have spent most of my time in a trip around the world in an effort to study at first hand the news conditions in the Far East," said President Noyes. "In my journeyings I was met everywhere with really remarkable cordiality. Some part of this welcome was due to old friendships, some to the delightful personality of those who accompanied me, some I think, to the marked brevity that characterized the speeches that I felt obliged to make.

"But, all this being said, truth also compels me to say that an accompanying feature of my welcome was an evident desire in very country to honor through me the Associated Press. I left America feeling very proud of our organization, and I come back with an even greater pride of the Associated Press. It is known everywhere as the foremost news-gathering organization in the world, and its reputation everywhere as to its absolute impartiality were the most heartening words I ever heard and I heard them at every point. I visited Japan and China, with their widely differing standpoints and they agreed that the Associated Press was the most impartial body of news-gatherers in the world.

"When I reached France and England I found the relations between those two countries somewhat strained. But also I found there the testimony from their business men and journalists that our entirely accurate news-gathering has been of a greater service to each of them. Everywhere it has the reputation that so far as is humanly possible, the Associated Press is entirely free from bias of every sort and I again express the most profound satisfaction for having heard these repeated expressions and I know they will meet with satisfaction from all of you.

"So this next year I will go back to my desk prepared to hear with equanimity and charity charges that the Associated Press is controlled and dominated by Republicans or Democrats, capital or labor, Protestant, Catholic or Jew, for I know that no one who has been informed and knows will make such charges and—well, I will just pity the poor nuts.

"I must observe that no partisan or biased service dominates the Associated Press collectively, but there still remain some elemental traces of partisanship in the individual membership; and this brings me by easy steps and without breaking the chain to what I rose to say. There is one point in which our eager partisanship holds, both collectively and individually, the membership of the Associated Press hold in the highest respect the great service of the President of the United States, and in respect and admiration and warm affection for the President personally. We are greatly honored that he has come to us today. We welcome him not only as the honored holder of a great position, but also as a fellow newspaper man of whom we are proud. I ask you to drink to the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding (Applause) and to the gracious lady of the White House, Mrs. Harding." (Loud applause.)

The annual toast of the Associated Press was drunk as the thousand diners arose, glasses aloft, and stood while the national anthem was played. President Harding didn't "follow copy" in his opening remarks.

"Mr. President, members of the Associated Press and guests," he began. "It is inevitable that the President, who happens to be a newspaper man, appearing before a newspaper gathering, must t a l k some kind of shop. I am willing to make the confession that I would rather talk newspaper shop to you than anything else. I believe I could do it hopefully some time because I have had my viewpoint a b o u t journalism broadened while twisting around occasionally in the executive c h a i r. (Laughter and applause.)

"Frankly, I have never squirmed under the criticism, but I have sometimes been appalled at inaccuracy of statement, and if I were going to lecture on journalism, my theme would be 'a little less eagerness a n d much more of ac- c u r a c y.' (Applause.)

"Not very long

In the language of Ohio, "Warren G. Harding, of the Marion Star and President of the United States, got a lot of dirt on his vest Tuesday night." It could not be helped. After the theatre he insisted upon a visit to the new home of the New York Tribune. Alex Torrey pressed him into service and above we have him finishing the job of putting the editorial page to bed.

WITH THE MARCHERS IN THE ANNUAL PEACOCK ALLEY PARADE

Convention Visitors from Every Part of Country Express Interesting Views on Labor, Advertising Rates, Newsprint, Editorial Standards and Other Problems in Exclusive Interviews with EDITOR & PUBLISHER

A SYMPOSIUM of opinion from editors, publishers and others of affiliated interests in newspaper work present at the Waldorf conventions demonstrated just one thing—there are 99 ways to make a successful newspaper, and every single one of them is right.

Questioned on developments of the past year and the trend of newspaper work in the future, successful newspaper men voiced antipodal opinions as to how it could be, and is being done. Some publishers declared that syndicate features gave circulation: others held that the circulation saturation point of features had been reached, and that the future was for the home produced, distinctively individualistic paper. The majority, however, favored the feature idea, if features were scientifically selected for their applicability to local fields.

In the Mid-Western group a belief that foreign news was being overplayed was noted. Eastern publishers, however, said this foreign news built circulation in cities where there was a large foreign colony. Many editors deplored the "standardization" and combining of newspapers, but others held this to be the inevitable future of newspaper work.

Radio broadcasting created the greatest storm. Some who had radios praised them as circulation builders through goodwill. Other editors found them expensive playthings. To others the mere word "radio" was anathema.

Various opinions follow:

M. H. DE YOUNG, publisher of the San Francisco Chronicle, told EDITOR & PUBLISHER that he believed the acme of newspaper success to lie through concentration on news. "A real newspaper is one that has the latest news," said Mr. de Young. "In the last analysis news is what counts with the buying public." He decried the tendency to turn newspapers over entirely to features and illustrations, and favored the four-color illustration as against the complex modern art type, pointing out that a four-color illustration can be produced in three days while three weeks are needed for the "oil painting" type of work.

Mr. de Young holds the unique record of being for 56 years the proprietor of his paper, which he founded at the age of seventeen in 1865.

HENRY M. PINDELL, proprietor of the Peoria Journal & Transcript, was at the Waldorf with a husky coat of tan acquired on a just-completed Mediterranean tour on the S. S. "Mauretania." On the trip he made a particular study of newspaper methods in different parts of the world. He holds that American newspapers cover the world better than does the press of any other nation, and said that on his return to America he was again impressed with the high standard of service and patriotism of the American press.

He emphasized, however, the advisability of a chose study of European newspaper methods by American publishers, saying that many points of news treatment could be picked up by foreign observation.

Mr. Pindell has solved one mystery of all time. Visiting the Valley of the Kings in Egypt, he comes back to report that the much press-agented King Tut pronounced his own name "Tut-tank-ahmen," no matter what people try to do with it today.

EDGAR B. PIPER, editor of the Portland Oregonian, was an enthusiastic advocate of radio broadcasting. The Oregonian broadcasting plant, he states, had opened up isolated fields on farms and lumber camps throughout Oregon and has even reached up toward the Arctic Circle to far off outposts of civilization in the Alaskan hinterland. He pointed out the obvious value of radio in using the broadcasting system to tell readers of valuable features about to be introduced in a newspaper, thereby creating interest that results in sales.

YOU can't keep a war horse from the field of battle, and Col. C. A. Rook, who has sold his holdings in the Pittsburgh Dispatch and retired from active newspaper work, heard the convention call while vacationing at Atlantic City, and took the first train for the Waldorf, renewing old acquaintances there. Col. Rook is now Director of Public Safety in Pittsburgh and in this position keeps in close touch with the newspapers there, but he declared that after 43 years of service in the game, he still had difficulty in not grabbing a pencil and starting editing whenever he saw a new edition on the streets.

"I do not intend to re-enter newspaper work," he said, "but I often feel that I'd like to buy a barrel of ink, open it up, and leave it in a corner of my office just to get the familiar smell of a newspaper shop around my office."

Col. Rook said that while combining newspaper properties was a good thing financially for the newspapers it was a bad thing for the reading public, defeating the real purpose of the press in centralizing the vocal expression of public opinion in the hands of a few men.

"St. Louis, New Orleans and Cleveland are all limited now to one morning paper," he said. "The public therefore gets only one opinion, and has no choice in the formation of its ideas on world affairs."

JUST producing a good newspaper is the secret of the circulation gains made by the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News, according to E. B. Jeffress, business manager. Cost of white paper and labor will be the determining factor in newspaper expansion during the coming year, according to Mr. Jeffress, who believes that the expansion will continue without danger of the much advertised "saturation point" unless costs unexpected intervene.

A fifteen-watt radio set installed by the Daily News has established a record by getting its messages picked up in Canada, and suggests some of the possibilities of broadcasting newspaper advertising.

"WHAT is the saturation point for features?" asked T. R. Williams, business manager of the Pittsburgh Press. "The question arises because the newsprint shortage has been overcome and prices are down to figures less than during the war crisis," he replied. "Newspapers can get news print, and thus can print more features. Many papers are putting in more features right along.

"Some publishers contend that there is a certain point at which stocking of features becomes a top-heavy proposition, an expense outlay that does not get more circulation due to the fact that a point of saturation has been arrived at.

"I hold that there is no such thing as a saturation point for features in daily papers. More and more excellent features are being put on the market. The publisher can get circulation from just as many features as he can get and put in his paper. He must use discretion, and pick his features to suit his public of course, but I believe that in addition to news the public wants entertainment from its newspaper, and is today demanding more and more of it."

DIETRICK LAMADE, president and general manager of the Grit Publishing Company, of Williamsport, Pa., stated that he bought few features, believing in the development of each paper along individualistic lines suited for its particular community. "We are making an endeavor to publish a paper for homes in the smaller towns," he said. "We want to give our readers clean material that will interest them, and not be over their heads. Conditions are changing, and have changed rapidly with the war, and we keep up with these changes. But we do not want to keep ahead of our readers in sophistication." He emphasized that syndicated features, originated by men in large cities for city circulation, did not necessarily please or satisfy the man in the smaller town, no matter how clever they might b declared his belief that locally p features and departments would b structed best to meet the local de Mr. Lamade believes that peop fundamentally interested in their their work, their gardens or farm their bank accounts.

THOMAS W. BRIGGS o Thomas W. Briggs Compan special feature advertising organ of Memphis, Tenn., which conduc ness review pages on 37 papers United States and Canada, head organization's delegation to the ence, others being N. J. Early, Krein and R. E. Briggs.

S. P. WESTON, who has just plished a great newspaper a ment in laying out the new plant New York Tribune, said, "The lat most important development in new making is the reduction of manufa costs by increase in production eff To achieve this end the first ste create in operation the well esta lines of practice which have been in other industries, and then to a building to fit the newspaper op instead of trying to fit the newsp the building."

dent Frank B. Noyes reported on round the world which was au- by the directors last year with a of securing world-wide inlets lets for A. P. news service, but rt was made not to the member- t to the board and its contents more familiar to the public after ting than they had been since Mr. left America last summer. His to the convention was in general quite similar to those in which he ed the annual luncheon, an ac- of which, with Mr. Noyes' and nt Harding's addresses in full, ap- n page 5.

meeting was unmarked by dis- n the floor and proceeded with hine-like smoothness that is char- c of A. P. annual gatherings. 00 members were present and the te cast was approximately 4,000, larger than the ballotting in 1922, ind the high record of 1921.

dent Noyes was re-elected for year and 25th term when the ard of directors convened Wed- morning in the Waldorf Apart- Florence D. White, member for w York Evening World, was first vice-president, and George ley of the Dallas News was elected second vice-president. Melville E. Stone was re-elected secretary, Frederick Roy Martin assistant secretary, and James R. Youatt, treasurer.

Victor F. Lawson declined re-election to the executive committee, stating that he found it inconvenient to attend its frequent meetings. The committee as constituted by the board, is now:

Frank B. Noyes, Washington Star.
W. L. McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin.
Adolph S. Ochs, New York Times.
Charles Hopkins Clark, Hartford Courant.
Elbert H. Baker, Cleveland Plain Dealer.
Clark Howell, Atlanta Constitution.
E. Lansing Ray, St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

One new member was elected at the annual meeting—D. E. Wood of the Redwood (Cal.) Tribune. Protest rights had been waived by all San Francisco members, with the exception of the Hearst papers, and the paper's election was recommended by the board of directors. It was carried by a viva voce vote.

The Kansas City Kansan, which withdrew its application of 1921 and was refused membership in 1922, in accord with the protest of the Kansas City (Mo.) members, was again turned back by the membership.

An interesting interlude was the refusal of the membership to admit either of the two Camden applicants—the Post-Telegram and the Courier—although their applications were backed by the New Jersey members. W. B. Bryant, publisher of the Paterson Press-Guardian, requested favorable consideration from the meeting for the Camden papers, stating that the New Jersey A. P. newspapers desired a connection within the organization in Camden, one of the most important industrial towns in the state and a center of a region fertile in news.

R. L. McLean of the Philadelphia Bulletin opposed the grant of membership on behalf of the Philadelphia newspapers, declaring that the A. P. was amply protected in Philadelphia and South Jersey by the correspondents of Philadelphia newspapers and that Camden was a part of the Philadelphia field. The viva voce vote was evidently close and President Noyes declared that the Philadelphia members, by their voting rights through A. P. bonds, and the number of proxies in their hands, decided the issue.

Two New York City papers which entered the daily field during 1922 also met the refusal of the membership to admit new members into fields already covered. They were the Corriere d'America, a morning paper in Italian, and the Bronx Home News, evening and Sunday morning. Others whose applications were turned down were the Berkeley (Cal.) Berkeleyan, Long Beach (Cal.) Press, Long Beach Telegram, Long Beach Morning Sun and Pasadena Star-News.

It was announced to the membership that the directors at their meeting on January 24 had adopted the following resolution, under which the above applications were presented to the meeting:

"Resolved, that at least thirty days' notice shall be sent to all members by mail of all applications for membership which are to be presented to the annual meeting."

Election of directors resulted in the return to office until 1926 of the following, whose terms expired this year:

Frank B. Noyes, Washington Star, 3,777 votes; W. L. McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin, 3,752 votes; Adolph S. Ochs, New York Times, 3,696 votes; and H. V. Jones, Minneapolis Journal, 2,975 votes. Benjamin H. Anthony, New Bedford Standard, was elected to the directorship vacated by the retirement of John R. Rathom, Providence Journal, with 3,045 votes. Henry M. Pindell, Peoria Journal and Transcript, received 1,536 votes.

Stuart H. Perry, Adrian (Mich.) Telegram, and for the past two years second vice-president of the A. P., was elected to the board to succeed C. A. Rook, whose term would have expired in 1925 but was terminated when he retired with the suspension of the Pittsburgh Dispatch. Mr. Perry received 1,831 votes, against 1,478 for A. K. Oliver, Pittsburgh Gazette-Times and Chronicle-Telegraph, the choice of the Pittsburgh members, and 424 for Richard M. H. Wharton, Harrisburg Patriot.

Frederick I. Thompson, who represents in the A. P. the Mobile Register, was elected to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of D. D. Moore, consequent to the latter's change of field from the New Orleans Times-Picayune to the Fort Worth Record. Mr. Thompson's name appeared on 2,601 ballots, against 1,045 for Mr. Moore, who was renominated to succeed himself. His term expires next year.

The board, as constituted for the next year, comprises the following:

Term Expires 1924—
Victor F. Lawson, Chicago Daily News.
W. H. Cowles, Spokane Spokesman-Review.
Frank P. MacLennan, Topeka State Journal.
Frederick I. Thompson, Mobile Register.
E. Lansing Ray, St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Term Expires 1925—

V. S. McClatchy, Sacramento Bee.

W. L. McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin.
Frank B. Noyes, Washington Star.

An interesting side light of the President's visit to the New York Tribune was the speed with which he made up the page shown above. On most papers in the east the makeup man works from a single galley with both hands, but President Harding makes up his page in true western style—using each hand to grab big spans of slugs from two different galleys at the same time—which prompted Alex Corry, one of the Tribune's oldest makeup men to nudge a fellow comp and remark: "Jiminy crickets, Bill! He's making up with both hands at once!"

Howell, Atlanta Constitution, in seconding the re-nomination to the board of President Noyes. Mr. Howell's remarks in part follow:

"I do not wish to be put in the attitude of making any invidious distinction among any of the list of splendid men under your consideration today to fill the vacancies on our next Board of Directors.

"I rise, however, in behalf of myself, and, informally and unofficially, for the members of the Board of Directors, to make a statement which no doubt could have been very much better made by the older and abler members of this board.

"The choice would naturally have fallen upon no less distinguished a person than Mr. Victor Lawson, patriarch of the organization, whose business associations, however, in the past with the gentleman to whom I make reference, counsel that it would be best left to another.

"Then the choice naturally fell upon Adolph S. Ochs, long an associate of Mr. Noyes. He frankly made the statement that he was too tender-hearted and too emotional, and that if he made this statement to the Board he might break down entirely.

"Passing it on to me is very much after the fashion of the man who had summoned a physician to attend his mother-in-law. He was notified that his mother-in-law was in a very desperate condition, and was advised immediately to send her to a hotter climate; whereupon he said, "Doctor, here is the hatchet. You do it; I am too tender-hearted." (Laughter).

"And so Mr. Ochs has passed it on to me; and now I wish to make simply the informal statement—not officially, but as an expression of the members of this Board who have served intimately and closely with your retiring President, Frank B. Noyes.—(Applause) — the statement which is perhaps not necessary that there is not a member of this organization who is not acquainted with the wonderful service rendered by the president of your organization, since the formation of the Associated Press.

"That I can perhaps unofficially, in behalf of his associates, make this statement more intensively, because for many years I have watched his work, I have been impressed with the earnestness and with the zealousness of his efforts, and never in any position have I ever seen a member of any business organization devote himself more earnestly, more steadfastly, more unselfishly to the affairs of that organization then Frank B. Noyes, as president of the Associated Press, has always done to the affairs of your great organization.

"For more than twenty years he has been a tower of strength, never swerved by friendship, nor by passion, nor by prejudice—always with the one end in view: that the thing to be done was that which was right, that which was fair, that which was just, and that which best served the purposes of the membership as a whole. Frank B. Noyes for more than twenty years has labored zealously and earnestly in your behalf, and more than to any other living man is due to him the greatness and the glory of the greatest news organization on the face of this earth. (Great applause).

"And, therefore, I warmly second the nomination of Frank B. Noyes as his own successor."

Advisory boards, nominating and auditing committees were named while the tellers were counting the ballots on the directorships, when the afternoon session convened shortly after three o'clock, with Vice-President Perry holding the chair in place of Mr. Noyes. The following advisory board were elected:

Eastern Division—Richard Hooker, Springfield (Mass.) Republican, chairman; Frank E. Langley, Barre (Vt.) Times, secretary; Charles E. Chapin, Waterbury (Conn.) American; Frank E. Gannett, Ithaca (N. Y.) Journal-News; George E. Graff, Williamsport (Pa.) Sun.

Central Division—H. J. Powell, Coffeyville (Kan.) Journal, chairman; Mrs. Zell Hart Deming, Warren (Ohio) Tribune, secretary; C. K. Blandin, St. Paul (Minn.) Dispatch; W. Y. Morgan, Hutchinson (Kan.) News; Arthur R. Trainor, Saginaw (Mich.) News-Courier.

Southern Division—Robert Ewing, New Orleans States, chairman; F. G. Bell, Savannah (Ga.) News, secretary; J. N. Heiskell, Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette; L. J. Wortham, Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram; W. C. Dowd, Charlotte (N. C.) News and Chronicle.

Western Division—A. N. McKay, Salt Lake City (Utah) Tribune, chairman; James D. Meredith, Sacramento (Cal.) Union, secretary; C. B. Blethen, Seattle (Wash.) Times; J. E. Wheeler, Portland (Ore.) Telegram; Dwight B. Heard, Phoenix (Ariz.) Republican.

Nominating committee was elected as follows:

Eastern Division—Jerome D. Barnum, Syracuse (N. Y.) Post-Standard; Edward Flicker, Bridgeport (Conn.) Telegram.

Central Division—Charles D. Simeral, Steubenville Herald-Star; Charles M. Greenway, Flint (Mich.) Journal.

Southern Division—H. C. Adler, Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times; J. S. Cohen, Atlanta (Ga.) Journal.

Western Division—J. R. Knowland, Oakland (Cal.) Tribune, chairman; Frank H. Hitchcock, Tucson (Ariz.) Citizen, secretary.

The following auditing committee members were named:

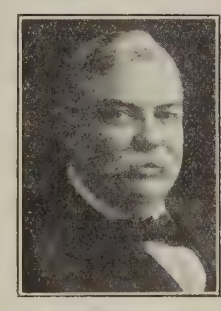
Eastern Division—Arthur G. Staples, Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

Central Division—J. C. Seacrest, Lincoln (Neb.) State Journal.

Southern Division—James M. Thomson, New Orleans (La.) Item.

Western Division—Frank S. Baker, Tacoma (Wash.) Ledger.

Quick work was made of the applications for membership, with the results noted above, and while the meeting was awaiting the announcement of the elections of directors, C. P. J. Mooney, editor of the Memphis Commercial-Appeal, took occasion to thank the directors, officers, and staff of the A. P. for their services during the year, embodying his thoughts in the form of a resolution which was passed unanimously—Mr. Mooney calling on all dissenters to stand up and be shot. His address was taken by the official stenographer as follows:



"Mr. Chairman, there has been performed for several years here by a very distinguished newspaper man, who was distinguished in his day, but who has been elevated to fields ambassadorium. I believe he is now Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Spain. I refer to Mr. Alexander P. Moore of Pittsburgh.

"I have been coming to these meetings for a long time, and there is a certain point in our very intricate proceedings here—which consist in meeting early in the morning, and voting, and getting our dinner tickets, and listening to a speech, and coming back and hearing the result of hearing the ballots counted, and having a nice time meeting each other, and then going home and putting all of our burdens and troubles upon the Board of Directors, to be our guardians for the next year. Some of us need them.

"Mr. Moore always introduced a resolution at this particular time, thanking the president, the officers of the association and the directors for their faithful and efficient service during the previous year.

"And in order that the Associated Press may keep up its custom of doing everything every year as it did it the previous year (Laughter), I undertake to take Mr. Moore's place in this matter, and—very seriously, though, gentlemen—on behalf of this organization I make a motion that this body do tender to its president, its officers, its directors, the members of its advisory boards, and to its operators, employees, editors and so forth—and we have some very splendid editors in this organization.

"We have some men here in this organization who are at these cross-points, and who have the difficulty of taking a four-wire report, sometimes, and cutting it into a single wire report. It is just like taking ten columns of news and condensing it into four columns. An the man on the single wire, seeing the four-wire report, thinks he ought to have as much of the Associated Press on his one wire as a big paper gets on four. Those men are very splendid men. They are doing a great work.

"The staff at Washington does a splendid work. That young man who same down here this morning escorting the President—I thought he was on his way to attend the wedding of the Duke of York, dressed as he was (Laughter). But he is a worthy fellow. He is an able man. And you will remember he wrote that interview of that 'day with ex-President Wilson,' which is one of the most splendid pieces of work that ever went into an American Newspaper.

"And here are these men whom you never see, and I never see, who are placed all over this country, from Maine to San Diego, occasionally breaking into the Associated Press with a story, every word of which lives in life and is splendid. And we get it, and we think nothing of it. If we got that same story from a special correspondent, or probably as a special cable from some New York paper which makes a business of peddling its news—we would think it was wonderful. And you know, sometimes those papers get two thousand and peddle ten. But that is neither here nor there. These men really are the fibre—they are the straw in the bricks of this splendid organization.

"And so I move that the members express their appreciation of the very faithful work that everybody connected with this organization has done, from the president down to the telegraph operators and the other minor employees, and that it thank them for what they have done during the past year. And we hope that no dire disaster overtakes some of the directors whom we have renominated, because they are men who have been here a long time running this organization in these days of disasters and trouble, and individualism, which President Harding himself referred to, stating this morning that a pure democracy was impossible.

"So it would be a great misfortune if the control of this organization fell out of the hands of the very splendid and conservative and intelligent men in whose hands it has been during the last several years.

"So therefore, I will take the liberty of putting my motion if I can get a seconder to it."

Several members seconded the motion.

Mr. Mooney continued:

"Now, gentlemen, it has been moved and seconded that this association express its appreciation for the very faithful and efficient service of its president, its officers, its directors and its employees during the past year. All in favo motion will please stand up."

All the members arose.

Mr. Mooney again continued:

"Sit down! Now, if there gentlemen that is not in favor motion, let him stand up and

Jones, Minneapolis Journal.

Louis Hannoch, of the Newark Sunday Call, and J. D. Barnum, of the Syracuse Post-Standard, served as tellers of the meeting and were re-appointed.

Change of the association's policy on supporting schools for training printers was the outstanding event of the unusually quiet meeting. The topic was broached after the committee on the Macon school had reported, and it brought forth a wide range of opinions. In fact, it was the only question which was thoroughly discussed at the meeting.

Many of the members felt that the association was not doing itself full justice in giving its entire financial support to one school, which, it was declared, could not meet the labor requirements of members in sections far distant. W. J. Pattison, of the Scranton Republican, was appointed chairman of a committee to resolve the differing points of view and recommend a course to the association. The committee, including members who had been active in the discussion, comprised the following:

Amon G. Carter, Fort Worth Star-Telegram; J. D. Barnum, Syracuse Post-Standard; Harry Chandler, Los Angeles Times; Urey Woodson, Owensboro (Ky.) Messenger, and E. B. Piper, Portland Oregonian.

S. E. Thomason,
Vice-President A.N.P.A.

J. S. Bryan
Secretary A. N. P. A.

Howard Davis,
Treasurer A.N.P.A.

The resolution, presented by Chairman Pattison and passed unanimously after considerable discussion, reads:

"Resolved: That the American Newspaper Association undertakes the sponsorship of Printing Trades Schools for instruction and training of printers, operators and other craftsmen in the printing trade. It is favorable to the plan of regional Printing Trades Schools in several sections of the United States and Canada, to be financially supported by newspapers in such designated territories by plans of assessment to be devised by the newspapers within such regions.

"To supplement the foregoing work and to encourage the development of such schools, there is hereby created a Printing Trades Schools Fund to be collected from the general membership of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, to be administered by the Board of Directors of said Association for the promotion of the Printing Trades Schools plan throughout the United States and Canada.

"Therefore be it Resolved: That the present assessment of $1.00 per machine per year be increased, effective July 1st, 1923, to an assessment of 25 cents per month per each typesetting or type-casting machine or other mechanical compositors owned or operated, or the product of which is used by each active newspaper member for the purpose of creating a Printing Trades Schools Fund, and such assessment is hereby levied against each member of this association, it being the sense of this convention that insofar as possible the fund shall be expended in such manner as to promote the education of printers in uniform proportion throughout the territory served by this membership."

H. N. Kellogg, in the report of the special standing committee, called special attention to the constitutional amendment passed by the International Typographical Union convention providing joint contracts for mailers and compositors with employers and for joint strikes. Chairman Kellogg condemned the policy as foreign to the procedure of the I. T. U. and likely to result harmfully to that organization, and his resolution, placing the association on record as declining to accept the I. T. U. law on this point, was passed, as follows:

"Whereas, The International Typographical Union has amended its constitution by adopting the following:

"Where printers' and mailers' unions, chartered by this union, have jurisdiction in different departments in the same establishment, contracts for employment shall be negotiated jointly and with identical expiration dates, and these contracts shall contain a clause that an authorized strike or a lockout in any department shall automatically terminate contracts covering other departments or unions."

"Whereas: This is contrary to the policy that the International Typographical Union has followed for years.

"Whereas: The said amendment is very objectionable, unacceptable to publishers and impractical of application, it is therefore

"Resolved: That members of the association refuse to negotiate contracts with printers and mailers jointly, decline to accept agreement providing coincident expiration dates, and refuse to sign contracts carrying sympathetic strike provisions."

Radio as an adjunct to newspaper publication came before the association at its opening session. Various views were expressed on the publication as news of radio broadcasting programs, whether department stores would eventually use radio for broadcasting sales, whether radio might be expected to interfere with newspaper advertising, and also whether newspapers should give free publicity to broadcasting stations and radio inventions. The discussion closed with a resolution authorizing the president to appoint a committee to consider the entire question of radio and the newspaper and keep members informed on developments throughout the year. President Patterson named the following committee: C. P. J. Mooney, Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial-Appeal, chairman; W. A. Strong, Chicago Daily News; E. B. Piper, Portland Oregonian; Daniel Nicoll, New York Evening Mail; Louis Hannoch, Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call; Harry Chandler, Los Angeles Times; Elzey Roberts, St. Louis Star; Rowe Stewart, Philadelphia Record; Amon G. Carter, Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram, and H. S. Scott, Detroit News.

Most of the committee represent newspapers which are active in radio broadcasting.

Recommendations by William B. Bryant, Paterson (N. J.) Press-Guardian, chairman of the advertising agency committee, were heartily endorsed, especially its code of practice for advertising co-operation. The committee's plan, put in the form of a resolution, was passed, as follows:

"Whereas: Your Committee on Advertising Agents was instructed to present to this convention a standard of practice with regard to co-operation; and

"Whereas: Your committee believes that while members should assist in every practical manner to secure the greatest success of advertising campaigns, and to confine the standard of newspaper merchandising and co-operative practice to service that is clearly within the province of newspapers to render; therefore be it

"Resolved: That these practices be confined to the following:

First—To furnish surveys of the local market.

Second—To encourage and to make possible an adequate distribution by supplying route lists of retailers for the use of salesmen of the manufacturer or advertiser who has made an adequate non-cancellable contract for space.

Third—And to limit the mailing of letters or broadsides, so called, to retailers when bills for printing and postage and other expenses are to be paid by the advertiser.

Harry Chandler and D. D. Moore reported to the convention on the work of the Open Shop Division, which was created last year, and received unanimous endorsement of their labors.

Mr. Kellogg, in reporting on the special standing committee's year, mentioned that publishers had been uniformly successful in disputes before the International Arbitration Board.

Victor F. Lawson, Chicago Daily News, narrated efforts of the publishers to secure renewal of the arbitration agreements with the international unions which expired last April. Only one such agreement has been concluded—that with the pressmen, who met the terms imposed by the A. N. P. A. conventions of 1921 and 1922. Other unions have refused to accede to the publishers' demands that all questions in dispute be made arbitrable, even those concerning international union law. An arbitration agreement proposed by the publishers is now before the directors of the International Photo-Engravers Union, Mr. Lawson stated, adding that no reply had been received from this union.

The A. N. P. A. reaffirmed for the third time its determination that future arbitration agreements be made only in accord with the previously expressed sentiment that union law be arbitrable.

Postal questions were given comparatively brief attention, aside from the reports of the committee on second-class postage and committee on Federal laws. Postmaster General Harry S. New, the association's guest and only outside speaker, on Wednesday morning reiterated his recent suggestion that delivery of newspapers would be expedited if they were wrapped in paper of a distinctive color, so that they would not be confused with other second-class mail which would not be hampered by slower delivery.

Favorable comment was made on the Postmaster General's suggestion, which was referred to the committee on second-class postage for action. Other questions referred to this committee were:

Whether the A. N. P. A. should ask the Post Office to insure newspaper bundles.

What action should be taken toward restoration of former efficiency of mail service, impaired through the space basis governing payments to railroads for mail transportation, and toward remedying mail delays due to congestion on account of heavy freight shipments carried as parcels post.

Whether the A. N. P. A. should submit a legal brief to the Post Office contending that white space on news pages should be credited to news rather than divided equally with advertising.

The committee reported failure in its co-operative efforts with other publishers' bodies for reduction of postal rates, due to refusal of Congress to pass the Kelly Bill. No criticism of the American Publishers' Conference argument before Congress was voiced by the A. N. P. A. postal chairman, S. E. Thomason, but he declared that the past year's experience convinced him that the newspaper publishers would secure best results through independent action of an A. N. P. A. committee.

C. H. Taylor, Director, A. N. P. A.

F. G. Bell, Director, A. N. P. A.

Mr. Thomason, who in addition to heading the postal committee, also served as chairman of the Federal laws committee, reported on his committee's success in keeping newsprint, groundwood and sulphite pulp on the duty free list. He also referred to the narrow definition of newsprint transmitted to the Treasury Department by the Collector of Customs at New York, barring from import free of duty all newsprint paper except 32-lb., white, machine-finished paper containing approximately 75 per cent ground wood and 25 per cent sulphite. The committee submitted a brief to the Treasury Department and to the Collector of Customs at New York and the matter is still before these authorities awaiting a decision. The sense of the committee's argument is contained in the following resolution, sponsored by Mr. Thomason and passed by the convention:

"Resolved that it is the sense of the membership of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association assembled in annual Convention that 'standard news print paper' as placed upon the free-list only as 'news print paper used in the manufacture of standard newspapers.'

"Be It Further Resolved that the Committee on Federal Laws be authorized and directed to urge upon the Federal Treasury Department and Collectors and Appraisers at the several ports the adoption of this definition in the interpretation of the Tariff Laws."

Exchange of views on advertising and circulation topics took up some time on Thursday, but no definite conclusions were evolved, and no information as to the character of the discussions could be secured from Charles H. Taylor, of the Boston Globe, who transmitted the account of convention activities to the press at the end of each session.

One proposed new activity—the formation and management by the A. N. P. A. of a body similar to the present Audit Bureau of Circulations—elicited some discussion, and was referred to the Board of Directors with power to act.

Some members privately expressed views that the present Audit Bureau of Circulations, while performing undoubted service to both newspapers and advertisers, gave newspapers too little voice in its management and had built up its large financial surplus largely from newspaper dues, which it was felt, should be reduced. Similar service conducted by the Newspapers for themselves, some members felt, would be just as efficient and considerably less expensive.

Returns from newsdealers, it was brought out in the circulation discussion, were not justified, but no formal opinion was expressed by the association. Other circulation topics received only general attention.

More general support of the work being done by the Bureau of Advertising was urged by several speakers, following the report of the Bureau, which is printed in full in another column.

Shortly before adjournment the convention rose to honor the memory of members whose deaths had been reported during the year, and the following resolutions were adopted:

"The reading of these names will not awaken the same memories for every hearer, and there is for every member present here today a bond of sympathy with those that have made the great interview—and that bond of union comes from the fellowship of labor and the common idealism that must of nature exist between all newspaper men, whether they have turned in their copy or are still on routine.

"Now therefore, as a mark of respect and as a tribute of fellowship and sympathy

Be it Resolved: That this convention, by a rising vote, adopt these resolutions and order them ot be spread on the minutes of this association; and further, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of each member so remembered.

"Since the last annual meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers Association 28 members of this association have ceased their activities and do now rest from their labors."

About 500 members were present at the Wednesday and Thursday morning sessions, the concluding assembly being depleted somewhat, possibly by the opening of the New York Giants' baseball season. Some 450 members were in their chairs in the Astor Gallery when President Patterson called the Wednesday morning meeting to order and opened it with one of the briefest presidential addresses in recent A. N. P. A. history. He covered only in the most general way the accomplishments of the past year, leaving details to the committee in charge. His address follows:

"In welcoming you here today I feel it is not necessary for me to dwell upon the great pleasure this official duty gives me. Rather I prefer to emphasize the gratification caused by the excellent attendance, as indicating the sustained interest of the membership in the work and aims of the association. You have come here in what, by all tokens, seems to be the busiest period that ever developed for the newspapers of the United States and Canada, a period that is witnessing the wildest activity on the part of daily newspapers.

"I think it may well be taken as evidence of the importance of these gatherings that publishers find it desirable to leave their busy offices to give the time to this week's deliberations; it is evidence, again, that this association functions as the only possible clearing-house of ideas on a national basis and serves as a reminder that the functions of this association cover a tremendous range in dealing with the problems of every section of the English-speaking portions of the continent and of every size and type of daily newspaper.

"For this reason it is well to bear in mind that our consideration of the matters presented for discussion and action must be on a nation-wide basis.

"It gives me a great deal of pleasure to bear witness to the excellent work done by your various committees since the last convention. Many important matters have arisen, requiring prompt and aggressive attention. I feel certain that after reading the detailed reports of these committees you will agree most heartily that they have done exceedingly well.

"I shall only take the time to call briefly to your attention some of the more important matters taken up during the year.

"Very soon after the 1922 convention the Committee on Federal Laws engaged itself in an active campaign to prevent the imposition of a duty on sulphite pulp. In furtherance of this work, a most effective organization of sub-committees in each state was worked out, and through these state advisory committees able support was secured for the efforts of the main committee. The result was evidenced in the prevention of the proposed tariff.

"In the late summer months the newsprint paper situation developed in such a way as to require especially aggressive and intensive work by the Paper Committee and the Newsprint Conservation Committee. In this effective assistance was secured from the many special sub-committees which were organized in practically every state for the purpose under the supervision of a state chairman.

"Consumption of newsprint had increased so rapidly over the first six months of the year that paper prices began to advance steadily. Demands for spot news were so heavy as to encourage practically all manufacturers to advance prices for contract paper under provision of the contracts allowing quarterly adjustments. By early autumn contract prices had been pushed up from an average of $3.50 per hundred pounds to $3.75 and in some instances to $4, and it was freely predicted by many manufacturers that a $4 per hundred rate or higher would prevail for the year 1923.

"The Newsprint Conservation Committee and its very effective sub-committees conducted a vigorous campaign to impress upon publishers the necessity of holding down as much as possible on the consumption of newsprint in order to lighten the pressure in the spot market; at the same time strong representations were made by the Paper Committee to the manufacturers to avoid serious upset of conditions by holding the contract prices for 1923 at a reasonable figure.

"These counsels of moderation prevailed to such an extent that a price of $3.75 a hundred was fixed for the first six months of the year. Consumption is continuing at a record-breaking rate, but fortunately expansions have taken place in the newsprint mills at a rate that should provide an ample supply of paper, provided publishers avoid extravagant and wasteful use of paper.

"After much patient work the Committee on Arbitration Contracts successfully concluded negotiations for a new arbitration contract with the International Printing Pressmen & Assistants' Union of North America, on the basis laid down by the resolution adopted by the convention in 1921. The situation as to the negotiations with the remaining unions continues deadlocked and presents one of the most important problems for consideration by the convention.

"The Committee on Traffic has had a particularly active year. Traffic conditions on the railroads became very acute in the fall. Many manufacturers were reporting shortage of cars. In certain sections of the country embargoes on certain classes of freight were established. The Traffic Committee has dealt n fectively with both situations.

he text of the report and financial tement follow:

The progress of the bureau during the al year just ended is shown by various elopments among which are men- ed:

The organization of a statistical de- tment.

The appearance in the newspapers of y new accounts on which active soli- tion has been conducted from the bu- u's three offices.

Further definite recognition by adver- rs and agencies of the bureau's use influence in developing newspaper ertising.

A greater variety of service for ncies and newspaper advertisers.

An increase in revenue sufficient to t the bureau's normal expansion.

The establishment of a statistical de- tment in charge of F. Douglas Camp- l, gives the bureau a long-needed op- tunity to make its research and pro- ion work more effective. The difficult k of classifying national advertisers h their various expenditures by ups is well under way, and the de- tment's program includes indexing, lyzing and adding to the merchandis- data in the bureau's files. The im- vement promised will be of especial p to the main office in co-operating h the bureau's branches and will make ilable valuable material for solicita- n.

National advertising in the newspa- s during 1922 is estimated to have n in excess of $200,000,000, a substan- increase over 1921, and bringing the ume near to the peak of 1920. This rease was made up largely of adver- rs who had not heretofore used the spapers extensively, if at all.

It has been gratifying to the bureau note among these new accounts many which its representatives have worked, in some cases almost since the bureau was established.

"Perhaps the most notable illustration of this is found on the Pacific Coast where the bureau's new office has been in active operation for more than a year. During that time there has been a marked change in sentiment among advertisers and agencies toward newspaper advertising, and the bureau's representatives have been of signal service in shaping this sentiment. The newly-developed reliance which the various Growers' Associations are placing upon newspaper advertising is both obvious and significant.

Recognition of Work

"The bureau has been gratified at many further evidences in the shape of unsolicited statements from advertisers, agencies and newspapers showing the effectiveness of its work.

"A prominent manufacturer writes:

"'If the bureau's work is to create a desire for newspaper advertising, we think you have accomplished it.'

"An advertising agency writes:

"'You will be glad to know that your assistance has again proved of value in landing a new advertiser for the newspapers.'

"A publisher writes:

"'Thank you for the splendid work you have done for the newspapers, as we feel sure that had you not interested yourself in this account it would still be classed as a national magazine account.'

"These letters are typical of many and are quoted to illustrate the recognition the bureau has won.

"The scope of the service rendered by the bureau should be noted briefly.

"A national advertiser spending $750,000 expressed his dissatisfaction with newspapers and a determination to change to other mediums. The bureau, after analysis of his position, recommended a change in copy and schedule, which the advertiser agreed to try. The results justified the experiment, and the account was retained for the newspapers.

Thomas H. Moore
Associate Director A. N. P. A. Advertising Bureau

"An advertising agent successfully enlisted the services of the bureau to demonstrate to a client that his line could be advertised in newspapers, although he confessed having failed in another medium.

"A representative of the bureau working in co-operation with newspaper men was able to induce a committee having in charge a community advertising plan to appropriate its fund for newspaper advertising in the face of adverse recommendations made by its advertising counsellors.

"In a word, the bureau's help has been demanded and successfully employed in every phase of advertising, from active solicitation to the furnishing of data and advice.

"The bureau continued its general promotion through literature, advertising and speech-making before conventions, boards, clubs and the like.

"The advance in income which made possible the enlargement of its work is evidence of the steadily growing confidence of the bureau's membership.

Non-Members in A. N. P. A.

"Your committee again draws attention to the fact that a large percentage of the A. N. P. A. membership, while profiting by the bureau's work, is not yet supporting it. Some progress has been made in bringing in these members during the past year, but your committee again urges a more general support of the bureau among A. N. P. A. non-members, and it makes this recommendation upon economic grounds.

"The Bureau is sound financially, and, with its present resources, is enabled to carry on its work successfully. The demands upon it, however, indicate larger opportunities for profitable service, and if the non-members among the A. N. P. A. membership will agree to pay the small sum entailed in joining the organization, the bureau will be able to add importantly to its successful work of developing more newspaper advertising.

"Of the A. N. P. A. membership, 285 members are not members of the bureau.

"It is worth noting that other mediums that have lost advertising while we have gained in the past few years, and are strongly organized for competition.

"While the newspaper is conceded to be the chief medium of national advertising, many factors in the field still militate against its further growth, and in the judgment of your committee, this situation can be met only by intelligent service and aggressive solicitation and propaganda such as the bureau puts forth.

"At the 1922 convention, the following resolution endorsing the bureau, was passed:

> "'Whereas, since the formation of the Bureau of Advertising in 1913, the volume of national advertising in the newspapers has been more than trebled, and that undoubtedly the bureau has been a big contributing force to this increase.
> "'Resolved, that the convention endorse the work of the Bureau of Advertising and recommend that publishers give more general support to the bureau by becoming contributing members.'

"Members of the A. N. P. A. who are not members of the bureau are earnestly requested to consider not only their obligations in this respect, but the opportunity which membership in the bureau will afford them to further a work which is being successfully conducted for their benefit.

Printed Salesmanship

"Reference to the auditor's statement shows that the bureau expended more money for printed matter than in the previous year. This is indicative of the constantly increasing demand for information concerning newspapers and newspaper advertising.

"In August the bureau brought out its new annual book, 'Today in the Newspapers.' The original edition of this book, 6,000 copies, was speedily exhausted and a second edition was ordered. Only about 100 copies now remain on hand and calls for books continue to come in every day.

"Many publishers who wanted quantities for distribution among their local advertisers purchased copies of 'Today in the Newspapers' at cost. Hundreds of gratifying comments on this book have been received, and in many instances the bureau has direct evidence of its influence upon advertising campaigns.

"Many requests for 'Today in the Newspapers' come as a result of the promotional advertising which is being run by our membership. This series of advertisements was prepared in response to many requests and was offered to publishers in mat form. One hundred and twenty-two newspapers were supplied with mats and many other publishers set the copy.

"Another book of a statistical character, compiled in co-operation with Editor & Publisher, is just off the press and will be distributed to advertisers and agencies this spring.

"The bureau made a major survey of the perfume market, which was in great demand by agents and advertisers handling toilet preparations.

"Minor surveys or briefs to meet specific situations have been constantly required. In one case an agent desiring to save an underwear account for the newspapers asked the bureau to prepare a written argument covering the points he should emphasize to his client. A letter of thanks is on file from this agent and the account continues in the newspapers.

"Briefs dealing with competitive situations, such as newspapers vs. street cars, or newspapers vs. billboards, were prepared during the year in answer to requests.

"There were many special investigations touching on jams, dye stuffs, food products and similar situations.

Solicitation

"The bureau's representatives spent 261 days traveling during the year and entered virtually every field of advertising activity for personal solicitation.

"The new San Francisco office was particularly active and the territory was covered intensively several times from Vancouver to the Mexican border. One trip was made by the Associate Director in co-operation with the Pacific Coast manager.

"There was splendid co-operation from individual newspapers and special representatives in many of these solicitations. The bureau's representatives made a large number of calls at the request of advertising agents who arranged the interviews with advertisers.

"One feature of the work that was highly valuable was frequent meetings with organizations of salesmen.

"The bureau has on record many letters testifying to the help it has given to advertisers, agencies and others and an even larger volume of letters testifying to the success of advertisers have scored through newspaper advertising.

Organization

"Your committee appointed at the 1922 convention consisted of William F. Rogers, Boston Transcript; Harry Chandler, Los Angeles Times; Howard Davis, New York Tribune; D. D. Moore, Fort Worth Record; Fleming Newbold, Washington Star; David B. Plum, Troy Record; S. E. Thomason, Chicago Tribune; Louis Wiley, New York Times; John B. Woodward, Chicago Daily News; Lafayette Young, Jr., Des Moines Capital; W. J. Hofmann, Portland Oregonian, and E. A. Westfall, Boston American.

"W. C. R. Harris, Toronto Star, a few days later was also appointed a member of the committee to represent the Dominion of Canada.

"The committee organized at a meeting in the Waldorf Apartments, April 28 at 1 p. m., by electing William F. Rogers chairman; Harry Chandler, vice-chairman, and Howard Davis, treasurer. David B. Plum was appointed chairman of the finance committee, with Louis Wiley as his associate.

"During the year, Mortimer D. Bryant was named to succeed Harry D. Reynolds as advisory member from the Six Point League of New York, and H. K. Clark was succeeded by F. E. Crawford as the representative of the Newspaper Representatives' Association of Chicago.

"Your committee remained intact during the year and held two meetings, one of which took place in the bureau's Chicago office on October 19.

"The chairman and finance chairman were frequently in personal touch with work of the New York office and all the committee were advised twice each month of developments through the confidential semi-monthly reports.

Membership

"One year ago the bureau had 382 members. At the close of its fiscal year, February 28, its membership was 373. Since these figures were taken off, there have been some additions to the membership and such changes as have taken place have not affected the bureau's income to any appreciable extent.

"The percentage of the A. N. P. A. membership who are not yet members of the bureau, is touched upon in another part of this report, but your committee desires to reiterate its suggestion that these newspapers should be enrolled in this important work.

Finances

"The bureau's finances continued in a healthy condition, and, notwithstanding the various enlargements, its income covered its expenses.

"The bureau's books were closed on February 28 and its accounts audited by Howard Greenman, C. P. A., at the direction of your committee. The total gross income for the year was reported as $75,145.41 and the total expenses $71,410.38.

"The additional expense of the statistical department and other enlargements will bring disbursements close to the income account during the coming year and the budget for 1923-24, as prepared for the finance committee, emphasizes the fact that any further enlargements must come through additions to membership.

CONVENTIONS

"The bureau's representatives were called upon to attend and speak before numerous conventions and meetings during the year. The Western manager represented the Bureau at the A. A. C. W. convention in Milwaukee, the Pacific Coast manager co-operated at advertising conventions on the Coast, and the director and his associate attended the convention of the Association of National Advertisers.

"The bureau continued its membership in the National Association of Newspaper Executives and has been in co-operation with that organization.

THE BUREAU'S DINNER

"At the suggestion of the A. N. P. A., no bureau luncheon was held last year, but the bureau held a dinner on the night of April 27 in the ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. There were about 840 participants. William F. Rogers, chairman of the committee-in-charge, presided, and William A. Thomson acted as toastmaster. Speeches were made by John W. Elwood of the Radio Corporation of America; Hon. G. M. Hitchcock, United States Senator from Nebraska, and Seymour L. Cromwell, president of the New York Stock Exchange.

THANKS

"Your committee thanks the officers of the A. N. P. A., the membership of the Six Point League and the Newspaper Representatives' Association of Chicago for their continuing courtesies and hearty co-operation. The splendid support the bureau has received from the trade press calls for a special word of commendation.

"The backbone of the bureau's success has been the loyal support of its membership, and your committee wishes to thank these publishers individually and collectively for the confidence, good will and co-operation they have always shown.
